BEATTY, C. J. The petitioner having been duly adjudicated an insolvent debtor, his assignee in insolvency filed a petition charging him with having concealed, smuggled, conveyed away, and disposed of property which should have been turned over to said assignee for the benefit of his creditors, upon which a citation was issued commanding him to appear before the superior court to be examined touching the matters alleged in the petition. In obedience to the citation, the petitioner came into court and was sworn, but declined to answer the questions put to him upon the ground that his answers might be made the foundation of a criminal action against him. Section 154 of the Penal Code reads as follows: "Every debtor who fraudulently removes his property or effects out of this state, or fraudulently sells, conveys, assigns, or conceals his property, with intent to defraud, hinder, or delay his creditors of their rights, claims, or demands, is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both." It is evident that any answers the petitioner might have made tending to support the allegations of the petition upon which he was cited for examination would also have had a tendency to convict him of the crime or public offense defined in the section quoted, and therefore he could not be subjected to compulsory examination. No person can be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself. Const. art. 1, § 13. To bring a person within the immunity of this provision it is not necessary that the examination should be attempted in a criminal prosecution against the witness, or that such a prosecution should have been commenced and actually pending. It is sufficient if there is a law creating the offense under which the witness may be prosecuted. If there is such a law under which the witness may be indicted or otherwise prosecuted for a public offense arising out of the acts to which the examination relates, he cannot be compelled to answer in any collateral proceeding, unless the law absolutely secures him against any use in a criminal prosecution of the evidence he may give; and this can only be done by a provision that, if he submits to the examination, and answers the questions, he shall be exempt from any criminal prosecution for the offense to which the inquiry relates. All these propositions are decided by the supreme court of the United States, upon an exhaustive review of the authorities in the case of Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195,—a case in every essential particular identical with this. There is no law of this state which would have exempted the petitioner from a criminal prosecution for fraudulent concealment of his property if his answers to the questions put to him had tended to convict him of the offense, and therefore we repeat he could not be compelled to answer. But the superior court held otherwise, ordered him to answer the questions, and, upon his persistent refusal to answer, committed him to the county jail for contempt of court. The imprisonment is illegal, and the prisoner must be discharged. It is so ordered.

HOLLAND v. ZOLLNER. (No. 15,281.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 7, 1894.)

MENTAL CAPACITY—OPINION EVIDENCE.

Testimony of one who is neither an expert nor an intimate acquaintance (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10), that a person's appearance was "irrational," though of doubtful competency, is not necessarily prejudicial when the witness also details the facts on which said conclusion was based. 36 Pac. 930, affirmed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Fracisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Augusta Holland, administratrix, etc., against Alfred Zollner. Decree for plaintiff affirmed in department. See 36 Pac. 930. On petition for hearing in bank. Petition denied.

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, J. W. Jellett, and A. Ruef, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood and A. Heyneman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petition for hearing in bank is denied. Conceding that the last question asked of the witness Mrs. French on direct examination, and the answer given thereto, were erroneous under the decision of this court in Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 406, 29 Pac. 1101, still, considering the cross-examination of the witness, and all the other evidence in the case, we do not think the error of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal of the judgment. The same may be said of the witness McKisick, and, furthermore, his testimony was not of a character to prejudice appellant.

GAROUTTE, J. (concurring). While concurring in the order denying a rehearing in this case, I am unable to concur in the views of the department holding that the question addressed to the witness upon the appearance of Holland, as to his being rational or irrational, was unobjectionable. At common law any one was entitled to give his opinion as to the mental condition of a party, while under the Code of Civil Procedure only intimate acquaintances are allowed to so testify. At the same time this provision should have a liberal construction, and a wide discretion as to such matters is vested in the trial court. In the present case a week's acquaintance and association of the character indicated in this record, in my opinion, furnished a foundation sufficient to support the admission in evidence of the witness' opinion as to Holland's mental soundness; and for this reason the evidence of which complaint was made was properly placed before the jury. But upon any other hypothesis the question addressed to the witness, to wit: "From the appearance of Mr. Holland at that time, with reference to his being rational or irrational, what is your opinion?" is objectionable. It is held in Marceau v. Insurance Co. (Cal.) 35 Pac. 856, that only experts and intimate acquaintances are entitled to give opinions upon this ultimate fact. And from whatever standpoint of vision you view this question it calls for the opinion of the witness. Indeed, it calls for it in direct terms. A witness who is neither an expert nor an intimate acquaintance may testify as to the acts and language of the party, and no further. To say that in your opinion a party appears to be a rational or irrational, sane or insane, is but saying in another form that, from what you have seen of him, you think his mind sound or unsound. The distinction between the two forms of expression is too refined and attenuated to be discovered, even by the most powerful search light. It is but a play upon words, and, if the practice of asking a question of this character be approved, all persons who have met the party, however unsatisfactory and fleeting that meeting, will be allowed to give their opinions as to his sanity, and thus the provision of the Code will become useless legislation upon the statute books. It is said in Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal., at page 416, 29 Pac. 1101, that the form of question we are here considering is even more objectionable than if the ordinary and direct interrogatory had been addressed to the witness. It is perfectly apparent to my mind that it is but doing indirectly (and the indirection is hardly perceptible) what the statute and the decisions declare cannot be done directly. People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 351, 12 Pac. 226, is the only case, to my knowledge, since the adoption of the Codes, that supports a contrary view. The case is not well considered, and no authority of any court is there cited to support the principle declared.

Action on Note — Allegation of Delivery — Action for Services — Complaint — Sufficiency.

1. In an action on a note, an averment that defendant "duly made" the note implies a delivery, and is sufficient as against a general demurrer.

2. In an action for services, a complaint which alleges that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in a certain sum on account of work, labor, and services performed at the request of defendant, and that he has not paid therefor, is sufficient as against a general demurrer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Clark, Judge.

Action by S. M. Smith against R. P. Waite on a promissory note and for services performed for defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Appel and A. M. Stephens, for appellant. R. G. Adcock and Wm. A. Ryan, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered against him by default, after a general demurrer to the complaint had been overruled; and the only question is, did the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? The complaint contained two counts,—one upon a promissory note, and the other for work, labor, and services performed for defendant. In the first count it is alleged that on a certain day "the defendant duly made a certain promissory note in writing, bearing date on that day, which said promissory note was in words and figures following." A copy of the note is then set out in haec verba, showing that it was payable to the order of the plaintiff. It is further alleged that plaintiff is now the owner and holder of said note, and that no part thereof has been paid. In the second count it is alleged that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in a certain sum of money "on account of work, labor, and services * * * performed at the request of the defendant," and that the defendant has not paid the same nor any part thereof. The objections are: (1) That there is no averment that the note was ever delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff, or that the defendant made it to the plaintiff; and (2) that it is not stated by whom the work was performed,—whether by plaintiff or some other person. And it is said: "If it was performed by another person, then there should be an allegation of the assignment of the account. The demurrer was properly overruled. Each count in the complaint sufficiently stated a cause of action, when tested only by a general demurrer. The averment that the defendant "duly made" the promissory note implies a delivery. "It is not necessary to aver the delivery of a bill or note, for the averment that a bill was drawn or note made includes the idea of a delivery, without which the drawing or making is not complete." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 63. And see Churchill v. Gardner, 7 Term R. 596; Russell v. Whipple, 2 Cow. 536; Prindle v. Caruthers, 15 N. Y. 425; Hook v. White, 36 Cal. 302. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

COSGROVE v. PITMAN et al. (No. 15,189.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

Injury to Employe — Incompetency of Fellow Servant—Drinking Habits — Evidence — Administratrix—Disqualification by Marriage.

1. In an action for personal injuries resulting from the negligence of a fellow servant, on the ground that his habit of using intoxicating liquors was of such notoriety that defendant must have known it, a recovery cannot be had where there is no evidence that he was intoxicated when the accident happened.

2. An instruction that if the fellow servant's habits of drinking had impaired his "standing" among engineers of his class, and among employers of engineers, and defendant knew or should have known thereof, plaintiff should have a verdict, is erroneous, as the engineer's "standing" among engineers or employés is immaterial if he did not have the habit of drinking.

3. Occasionally taking a drink or occasionally being under the influence of drink does not constitute such a habit of drinking as would authorize a finding that one was thereby rendered incapable of managing an engine.

4. The marriage of an administratrix does not of itself deprive her of authority to sue as such.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Helen Cosgrove, as administratrix of the estate of James Cosgrove, against H. C. Pitman and another for damages for the death of her husband. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd, for appellants. Henry E. Highton, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendants are stevedores, and in August, 1885, were engaged in discharging a cargo of coal from the vessel Henry Hyde, then lying at one of the wharves in San Francisco. The plaintiff's intestate was in their employ, and, while so engaged, a tub of coal, which was being hoisted from the hold of the vessel, swung around so that it might be emptied into another vessel alongside, and struck him with such force as to cause injuries from which he died. The plaintiff, as the administratrix of his estate, brought this action against the defendants to recover the damages sustained by his death, alleging that it was caused by reason of their negligence. The coal was hoisted by means of a donkey engine on the wharf, which was in charge of an engineer named Murphy, who, at signals from another employé, started and stopped the engine; and it is claimed by the plaintiff that the injury to the deceased was caused by the negligence of this engineer; and, in order to avoid the rule of law which exonerates the employer from liability to an employé for an injury resulting from the negligence of a fellow servant, the plaintiff sought to show that Murphy was addicted to the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors, and that this fact was of such notoriety that it must have been known to the defendants, and that therefore they were guilty of negligence in having him in their employ. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants have appealed.

Murphy's capacity as an engineer, aside from the impairment of such capacity by reason of this alleged habit, does not seem to have been questioned by the plaintiff, and there was ample evidence of such capacity shown at the trial. The plaintiff did not attempt to show that Murphy was intoxicated at the time of the accident, nor was there any evidence of that purport before the jury. Murphy himself testified, and there was no evidence tending to contradict his statement, that he was not intoxicated on the day of the accident, and had not taken any intoxicating liquors either on that day or for a year prior thereto. The testimony of Nagle that in the morning of that day, while Murphy was fixing his engine, and seemed to be in a hurry, some one remarked, "I guess he is drinking a little," is not entitled to any consideration as evidence that he had in fact been drinking. Upon the theory of the plaintiff that the injury resulted from the negligence of Murphy, if she would charge the defendants with the results of this negligence, by reason of their having him in their employ, with knowledge of his intemperate habits, it was necessary for her to show that the injury was in some respect the result of such intemperate habits. Unless the accident was in some way connected with such habit, or resulted from intemperance, the habit was not the cause of the negligence, and the defendants could not by reason of this habit be rendered liable for the negligence of Murphy produced by any other cause. If the fact of Murphy's habit of intemperance at or about the time of the accident had been shown, the jury might have inferred that he was in that condition at the time of the accident, and that his negligence was the result of this condition. Proof of his being under the influence of liquor at the time of the accident would be presumptive of his negligence, and, if it had appeared by direct evidence that he had a habit of intemperance, it would throw upon the defendants the burden of showing that he was not then in that condition; but proof that he had at some previous time the reputation of having the habit is not proof of the fact that he did have the habit. To allow the proof of his reputation for drunkenness to be equivalent to establishing the fact that he was addicted to drunkenness, and from that to make the further inference that from his habit he was so at this time, would be to draw an inference from a presumption. Unless facts are shown from which negligence may be reasonably inferred, a jury should never be permitted to infer, arbitrarily and without evidence, that there was negligence. When a fact is established, some other fact may be justly inferred therefrom, but when the plaintiff, instead of presenting a fact or facts from which the negligence of the defendant may be reasonably inferred, gives to the jury only a presumption drawn from other facts, the jury are not to be allowed to infer negligence from such presumption. An inference cannot be drawn from a presumption, but must be founded upon some fact legally established. See Douglass v. Mitchell's Ex'r, 35 Pa. St. 443.

For the purpose of establishing this habit in Murphy, the plaintiff offered evidence of his reputation in the matter of drinking, and also the testimony of certain witnesses that they had at times seen him "under the influence" of liquor. None of the witnesses testified that they had ever see him intoxicated, or that he was in fact accustomed to habitual drinking. It was shown that he would occasionally drink, "to be sociable and pleasant," and also that it was quite common for engineers to drink. One witness, when asked about his habits with respect to drink prior to the day of the accident, said: "I have seen him take a drink once in a while. I have seen him when he was pretty full." And when asked how frequently said: "Well, not very often. It might be once a week, or something like that." Another witness, when asked with reference to his habits of drink, said that "for some months prior to 1885" he would take a drink frequently, and that quite a number of times he had known of his drinking to excess; that for four, five, or six years before the trial (March, 1891) he had not conducted himself so well with respect to drink, and a great many would not employ him. The witness did not, however, state when or how frequently he had known of his drinking to excess. Another of the plaintiff's witnesses testified that the "standing" of Murphy "along about 1885" was bad, on account of drinking, and that among the pile drivers for four or five years prior to the trial he was not thought to be a "safe" man. Another, who had seen him drink in 1883, said that since that time "I have considered that he drank too much whisky to take care of an engine." He does not, however, state that he had had any knowledge of Murphy's habits or conduct for two years prior to the accident. This was substantially all the evidence that was given by the plaintiff for the purpose of showing that Murphy was addicted to the habit of drinking.

When the evidence was offered, the defendants reserved the right to move to strike it out, if the plaintiff failed to bring it home to them, or should fail to show that Murphy was under the influence of liquor at the time of the accident; and at the close of the plaintiff's case they made this motion, and it was denied by the court. This motion should have been granted. It cannot be said that to take an occasional sociable drink, or even to be occasionally "under the influence" of drink, constitutes a habit of drinking, or that a jury would be authorized to infer from such evidence that the man had been rendered incapable of properly managing his engine, when he had not been drinking for a year prior thereto. Proof of specific acts is not equivalent to proof that Murphy had either this reputation or the habit. "Character for care, skill, and truth of witnesses, parties or others, must all alike be proved by evidence of general reputation, and not of special acts. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 461-469. Character grows out of special acts, but is not proved by them, though, indeed, special acts do very often indicate frailties or vices that are altogether contrary to the character actually established, and sometimes the very frailties that are proved against a man may have been regarded by him in so serious a light as to have produced great improvement of character." Frazier v. Railroad Co., 38 Pa. St. 110. The instruction of the court upon this proposition, given at the request of the plaintiff,—that "if an engineer should be proved skillful and competent to run a dummy engine by reason of his intelligence, skill, and experience, and yet should be unsteady and unreliable on account of a habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess, he would not be a competent engineer, within the meaning of the law,"—should not have been given. There was no evidence before the jury from which they were authorized to find that Murphy had the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess, or that he was unsteady or unreliable at the time of the accident. While proof that Murphy had a general reputation for drunkenness might be held to impute to the defendants knowledge of such reputation, and, consequently, impose upon them the necessity of making inquiry with reference to the fact, and charge them with the consequences of not doing so, yet such proof would not establish the fact that he was in reality so addicted, and it might be that the inquiry by the defendants, after being informed of the reputation, would show that the reputation was without foundation; otherwise, the defendants would be charged with the consequences of a trait that never existed. Upon this proposition the court instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that, under the law as explained to you by the court, James Cosgrove was injured without contributory negligence on his own part, through the negligence of the engineer, James Murphy, and that the said James Murphy was a man whose habits of drinking had impaired his standing among engineers of his class, and among the employers of such engineers, and was not a safe man to be employed to run a dummy engine in connection with stevedoring work in discharging ships, and that the defendants knew, or by reasonable inquiry might have known, these facts, and that, nevertheless, they employed him on August 25, 1885, to run the engine in discharging coal from the Henry Hyde, and that said James Cosgrove did not know, and had no means of knowing, of the engineer's drunkenness and unfitness, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff." This instruction should not have been given. Aside from the statement implied therein that the drunkenness and unfitness of Murphy was a fact in the case, the "standing" of Murphy among engineers or employers was an immaterial element in determining his capacity or negligence. It was relevant only for the purpose of putting the defendants upon notice that such was his reputation, and they were bound by the consequences, if the reputation was founded upon fact. The knowledge by the defendants of Murphy's standing among engineers did not charge them with any negligence, if he did not in reality have the habit of drinking, and, as we have seen above, there was no evidence before the jury of any drunkenness of Murphy at the time of the accident, or from which they could draw the inference that at that time he had a habit of drinking.

It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff was the wife of the deceased, and that after the commencement of the action, and before the trial, she had remarried. The defendants objected that by her remarriage her authority as administratrix was extinguished. and she could no longer maintain the action. It has been held, however, that the marriage of an executrix does not, eo instanti, deprive her of her power to act, but is merely ground for a proceeding for her suspension and removal. Schroeder v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 343, 11 Pac. 651; McMillan v. Hayward, 94 Cal. 357, 29 Pac. 774. The same principles apply in the case of an administratrix as an executrix, and there was therefore no error in this ruling of the court. As the case is to be remanded for a new trial, we do not deem it proper to indicate any opinion concerning the weight of evidence upon the issues of negligence or contributory negligence. The judgment and order are reversed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur.

FITZGERALD, J. I concur in the judgment.

GAROUTTE, J. It is claimed that the accident occurred by reason of the negligence of the engineer, a servant of the defendants and a fellow servant with the deceased. To support plaintiff's case under this state of facts, it was not only necessary to prove that the engineer was intoxicated at the time of the accident, but that defendants were guilty of negligence in employing him. It was proven that his general reputation for sobriety was bad, and it may be conceded, for the purposes of this case, at least, that defendants were lacking in the exercise of due and proper care in hiring such a man. But there is no evidence in the record that he was intoxicated at the time of the accident, and nothing therein from which we are justified in drawing an inference to that effect. I concur in the judgment.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE.

MILLBRAE CO. v. TAYLOR et al. (No. 15,039.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1894.)

USE OF TRADE NAME—INJUNCTION.

Defendant, the owner of land known as "Millbrae Station," formed a copartnership with plaintiffs to keep cows on said land, and sell the milk therefrom under the trade name of "Millbrae Dairy." Afterwards the partnership was dissolved, plaintiffs taking the milk routes and business of selling milk, and defendant, who remained the owner of the land, agreeing to supply them with milk therefrom. Later plaintiffs terminated the contract with defendant, and took no more of his milk, but still conducted a milk business under the name of the "Millbrae Dairy," and formed a corporation under the name of the "Millbrae Company," to carry on the business. Held, that plaintiffs could not ask for an injunction to restrain defendant from using the name "Millbrae" in a competing business, since their own use of the name was a fraud on the public.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Wm. T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Millbrae Company against H. H. Taylor and others to enjoin the use of a trade name and for damages. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wheaton, Kalloch & Kierce, for appellant.
Maxwell & McEnerney, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Action to enjoin the defendants from using a "trade name," which it is alleged belongs to the plaintiff (a corporation), and for damages. Findings and judgment were against the plaintiff, and this appeal is taken from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial. An outline of the facts, condensed from the findings, may be thus stated: Some time prior to 1865, the defendant D. O. Mills became and still is the owner of a tract of land in San Mateo county, at the railroad station now, and ever since 1865, known as Millbrae station. From 1865 until August, 1883, A. F. Green and defendant Mills were copartners, engaged in the business of raising and keeping cows of superior quality and breed upon said land, and selling the milk therefrom in the city of San Francisco, said business being conducted, at least since 1875, under the trade name of "Millbrae Dairy;" the word "Millbrae" being compounded of the name of the owner of the ranch (omitting the "s") and the Scotch word "brae." In August, 1883, F. H. Green purchased a one-third interest in the cows and other personal property and business, and the firm as thus constituted continued the business until September 1, 1886, under the same trade name. At the date last named the copartnership was dissolved by mutual consent, and in the settlement A. F. and F. H. Green took the milk routes and business of selling the milk in San Francisco, with the wagons, horses, and appurtenances, and defendant Mills, who was at all times the sole owner of the land, took all the dairy implements, supplies, cows, and other personal property at the ranch, and on the same day entered into an agreement with said A. F. and F. H. Green whereby he agreed to sell to them and they agreed to buy, not less than 270 nor more than 390 gallons of milk per day, at a price therein specified, the milk to be thus furnished by defendant Mills to be exclusively from his own dairy, and this agreement was to continue for at least one year. A similar agreement was made each year, the last being dated September 1, 1889, the quantity named therein being not less than 360 and not exceeding 410 gallons per day. This contract stipulated that it should be in force for at least one year, and thereafter until one of the parties should give the other three months' notice of his intention to terminate it. About July 1, 1890, A. F. and F. H. Green organized a corporation under the name of the Millbrae Company (the plaintiff herein), and conveyed to it their said business, property, and good will, they being the principal stockholders therein, and practically owning and carrying on said business through said corporation, and on the 1st of August, 1890, ceased to take milk from defendant Mills under said contract, and thereafter the plaintiff procured from Marin county the milk with which it supplied its customers. Until the formation of the corporation, the business continued to be conducted by A. F. and F. H. Green under the name of the "Millbrae Dairy," and their delivery wagons were so marked, and that name was printed upon their bills and receipts, upon which it was also stated that the milk was "produced on Millbrae farm, San Mateo county." After the organization of the corporation, the name on the wagons and bills was changed to "Millbrae Company," and on the bills it was stated simply "pure country milk, produced from rich pasture, wholesome feed, healthy cows;" without any indication as to the locality except the word "country.' On September 1, 1890, the defendant D. O. Mills commenced the business of selling milk from his said dairy in the city of San Francisco, and engaged defendant Taylor as agent for that purpose, and employed defendant Cole to manage the sale and distribution of the milk in the city; and in this business adopted and used upon his wagons and upon his bills the original trade name, "Millbrae Dairy," but specified upon his bills and advertisements that the milk sold was from the Millbrae dairy, in San Mateo county, and added: "Do not confound it with the Millbrae Company." At the time of the dissolution of the copartnership, a valuation was put upon all the property, and among other items of the city branch of the business, which was taken by A. F. and F. H. Green, was "100 cans' trade, $4,000."

The foregoing facts are not disputed, and are sufficient to present the principal question in the case. There are several specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify certain findings, but these can be more briefly disposed of after deciding the principal question, since if the findings excepted to were framed as appellants suggests they would not change the result. It is insisted by appellant that the "trade name" is a part of the good will sold by defendant Mills to Green & Green, and for which they paid a large sum of money; that such name is an important element in such good will, and that plaintiff has the exclusive right to its use. Appellant is in error as to the facts to which he applies the law, and hence is wrong as to his conclusions. The findings upon this subject are not only supported, but are made clear by the testimony of F. H. Green, who was one of the parties to the contract under which it is claimed the good will of the business and the right to use the trade name was sold by defendant Mills. He said: "Prior to that time (referring to his purchase of an interest in 1883) the business had been carried on by D. O. Mills and my father, under the name of the 'Millbrae Dairy.' I think they gave it the name of the Millbrae dairy in 1875 or 1876. In 1883 the business was in the name of the Millbrae dairy. I continued in business with them some three years. In 1886 we entered into an agreement to divide the business up. Mr. Mills took the interest in the country, and my father and myself took the interest here. Since that time my father and myself conducted the business under the name of the Millbrae dairy." It will also be observed that on the day of the dissolution of the partnership the contract was entered into for the sale by Mills to the Greens of the milk produced at Millbrae, and by which the Greens agreed to sell the same in San Francisco, and that defendant Mills has ever since continued the business of keeping cows and producing milk at the same place and under the same name. There was nothing said in the contract about the sale or transfer of the good will, or of the use of the name under which the business had been conducted. It was not a sale of the entire business with which the name was connected, but a "division" of the business, and the name was equally applicable and equally important to each part. So long as the Greens or their successors continued to sell Millbrae milk, there was no conflict of interest in the use of the name, nor was there any agreement, covenant, or obligation that the Greens should have the right to use it longer than they continued to sell Millbrae milk. On the contrary, the fair and reasonable implication was that the name should only be used in connection with the sale of milk produced by the owner of the ranch and dairy familiarly known by that name, and which name was even more important to be retained by the owner of the ranch than by one whose right to sell the milk depended upon a yearly contract. Nor was this contract terminated by defendant Mills, but plaintiff, for its own advantage, voluntarily terminated it by a three-months notice, under the terms of the contract, and now insists that it may deprive defendant Mills of all use and benefit of the well-established name in disposing of his milk, while using the false name of "Millbrae" for selling the milk of a competing producer.

It is not necessary to review the cases cited by appellant, for the question involved is no longer an open one. In the case of Joseph v. Macowsky, 96 Cal. 521, 31 Pac. 914, it was said: "A person who comes into a court of equity for an injunction in a case of this kind must come with clean hands. He cannot be granted relief upon a claim to the exclusive use of a trade-mark which contains a false representation, calculated to deceive the public as to the manufacturer of the article and the place where it is manufactured. Browne, Trade-Marks, §§ 71, 474; Palmer v. Harris, 60 Pa. St. 156; Fetridge v.

Wells, 13 How. Pr. 385; Hobbs v. Francais, 19 How. Pr. 571; Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 2 Sup. Ct. 436. In Siegert v. Abbott, 61 Md. 284, the court said: 'It is a general rule of law in cases of this kind that courts of equity will not interfere by injunction where there is any lack of truth in the plaintiff's case; that is, where there is any misrepresentation in his trade-mark or labels.'" If, at the time the partnership was dissolved, D. O. Mills had sold to his copartners the ranch and dairy, as well as his interest in the business of selling the milk there produced, the property in the trade name and the exclusive right to use it would have passed to the purchasers, and Mills could not have applied the name to another ranch or dairy and used it in the like business to the injury of the plaintiff. By the division of the partnership property and business, coupled with the contracts for the sale of the same milk, the Greens acquired the right to use the trade name so long as they sold Millbrae milk; but they could not rightfully use it after they ceased to sell that milk, without wronging both Mills and the public. It does not aid the plaintiff's case that Marin county milk, which it now sells, is as good or even better than Millbrae milk. As was said in a similar case, "the privilege of deceiving the public, even for their own benefit, is not a legitimate subject of commerce." Prince Manuf'g Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co., 135 N. Y. 24, 31 N. E. 993. For a full discussion of the questions principally involved in the case at bar, see the case last above cited, and, also, Pepper v. Labrot, 8 Fed. 29, and Huwer v. Dannenhoffer, 82 N. Y. 499. In Atlantic Milling Co. v. Robinson, 20 Fed. 217, it was held that the right to the symbol is inseparable from the right to make and sell the commodity which it has been appropriated to designate. Pierce v. Guittard, 68 Cal. 68, 8 Pac. 645, is entirely consistent with Joseph v. Macowsky, supra, and is against appellant.

It is claimed that the second finding is, in effect, that defendant Mills first used and adopted the name "Millbrae" before his partnership with A. F. Green, and that this is not justified by the evidence. Whether this name was adopted before or after is wholly immaterial. It had certainly been used many years before the dissolution, and was well known. It was the name of a locality, and attached thereto, no matter by whom nor when it was originated. Whether Millbrae farm is or is not shown by the evidence to be "peculiarly" fitted and adapted to the purpose of producing milk, or that it is not shown to produce better milk than other farms or dairies, is also immaterial. The name used to indicate milk produced on that farm had become valuable, and the question here is not one of comparison with other milk or other ranches, but whether defendant Mills shall be deprived of the use of a name that is valuable to him. The finding that "D. O. Mills never sold nor conveyed to A. F. Green and F. H. Green nor to either of them, the good will of the business of selling milk in the city of San Francisco," is, I think, supported by the evidence. The evidence shows that at the time of the dissolution of the copartnership four milk routes were operated. Those routes were not defined in the evidence. There was no agreement that Mills should not engage in that business in the city. Whatever might be said of the "routes" then operated, there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that he intended to exclude himself from the business of selling milk in the city, unless during the continuance of his contracts with his former partners. Besides, so far as the use of the trade name is concerned, the good will of the milk routes is an immaterial factor. It was found by the court that Green & Green "were to take from D. O. Mills all the milk which might be necessary to carry on the said business;" and this, it is said, is not justified by the evidence. The agreement, as we have seen, specified a minimum and maximum quantity, and, while they did not contract not to buy or sell other milk, and the evidence shows that they sometimes did so, yet the finding is substantially true. It was a division of the business, and during the continuance of these contracts they advertised no other milk, and there is no evidence tending to show that it was not usually sufficient to supply their customers. The finding that the use of the word "Millbrae" was a representation to the public that the milk sold was produced at Millbrae farm or dairy is incontrovertibly supported by the evidence, as is also the finding that the use of the same word by the plaintiff after it ceased to sell Millbrae milk was a false representation. The assurance given by plaintiff to its customers that it was selling them Marin county milk could not have been necessary if the use of the word Millbrae did not imply that it was selling milk from Millbrae dairy.

It was further alleged in the complaint that defendants Taylor and Mills entered into a scheme which had for its object the going into the business of selling milk in said city, and of obtaining customers by enticing away the customers of the plaintiff; that in pursuance thereof they induced the defendant Cole, who had been in the employment of the plaintiff and its predecessors for 15 years, and had full knowledge of their milk routes, to leave the plaintiff and enter into their service, and were thus able to impose upon the customers of the plaintiff and sell them milk while such customers believed they were purchasing from plaintiff; that defendants' wagons closely resembled plaintiff's, and had painted on them the words "Millbrae Dairy," and were run under the personal charge of defendant Cole, and by these means, and particularly by using the name "Millbrae," and having the same painted upon their wagons, and having them in charge of defendant Cole, have been drawing away plaintiff's customers, and allege damages in the sum of $500. Upon these issues the court found that no scheme was entered into; that none of plaintiff's customers were imposed upon, or bought milk from defendants when they supposed they were buying from plaintiff; that the wagons used by defendants do not resemble plaintiff's wagons; that none of plaintiff's customers have been drawn away, except by fair and open competition; that none of said customers were misled by the defendants' use of the trade name "Millbrae," and that plaintiff has not sustained any damage. Appellant claims that none of these findings are supported by the evidence. That defendants sold milk to a very considerable number of the former customers of plaintiff is not disputed. Whether defendants obtained these customers by improper means is a mixed question of law and fact; the means used being a question of fact, but whether such means were improper is a question of law, depending upon the relation of the parties, and their rights and duties towards each other. There is no doubt that plaintiff has sustained loss by the competition of defendants, but whether such loss is a legal injury, entitling the plaintiff to recover damages, is quite another question. The use of the trade name, so long used by plaintiff and its predecessors, must necessarily aid the defendants in securing custom, but, having the right to use it, plaintiff cannot complain. The circulars used by defendants for advertising their business were headed "Millbrae Dairy, of Millbrae, San Mateo County," and informed the people that they would sell their own milk, and further said, "Do not confound it with the Millbrae Company." We think these findings are fully justified by the evidence, notwithstanding the evidence shows that plaintiff suffered loss in consequence of what defendants did. Some of these findings, taken by themselves, are mixed conclusions of law and fact, and necessarily so. But they must be read in connection with the other findings, showing the relations of the parties and their rights and duties toward each other. Appellant contends that "a person who sells the good will of a business will be enjoined from again setting up business at such a place and in such a manner as to destroy or diminish the business of which he had sold the good will; that the sole issue is between D. O. Mills, the vendor of the good will of a business, and appellant, successor to his vendees." We think that the only good will that was sold by Mills was the good will of the routes then operated for the sale of Millbrae milk; that it was not the intention of Mills to shut himself out from them, nor from any part of the city, if his vendees should cease to sell his milk. His vendees might have exacted other conditions, but they did not do so. In the language of F. H. Green, it was a "division of the business" theretofore carried on by the so-called vendor and vendees as partners, and that business was the sale of Millbrae milk. Mills did not sell the good will of the business of selling any other milk, as no other milk was sold, and his vendees could not divert the place where that business was conducted to the sale of a competing article, and shield themselves from his competition by claiming that the good will continued, not only as to the place, but as to the place used for selling a different and competing article. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the cases cited by appellant in support of the proposition that the vendor of the good will of a business "must do nothing to impair or injure it" (a proposition which certainly requires material qualifications), or those other cases which undertake to specify with more or less particularity what the vendor who again enters upon a similar business may or may not do in furtherance of it.

I think the evidence justifies the findings, and that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

MERRILL et al. v. CLARK et al. (No. 18,284.)

PUBLIC LANDS—TRANSFER BEFORE RECEIVING PATENT—WHEN PERMISSIBLE.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2263, providing that before any notice is made under section 2259 proof of the settlement and improvement thereby required shall be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land districts in which the lands lie, and that all assignments and transfers before the issuing of the patent shall be void, one who has delivered the final proof of his pre-emption claim, the affidavit required by statute, and the money for the land to the register may transfer the land, though he has not received a patent therefor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

Ejectment by W. C. Merrill and another against Mary Clark and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Shinn & Shinn and S. Solon Holl, for appellants. Spencer & Raker, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of 120 acres of land in Lassen county, in this state. The respondents had judgment in the court below, and from this judgment, and an order overruling appellants' motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken. Both parties are claiming title from one W. H. Clark. The facts material to a disposition of this litigation may be briefly stated as follows: W. H. Clark, the husband of respondent Mary, upon the 5th day of November, 1881, made final proof upon his pre-emption claim to this tract of land before a deputy county clerk of Lassen county. He also at the same time made the affidavit provided by section 2262 of the Revised Statutes, and paid for the land, with all legal costs and charges. The final proof, affidavit, and money were delivered to the register of the land office at Susanville, and, by reason of the neglect or dishonesty of the said register, no further action towards the securing of a patent was taken for many months. Shortly subsequent to the date of final proof, W. H. Clark, by bargain and sale deed, transferred the land to the respondent Mary Clark. Subsequent to this event the certificate of purchase was issued, and the patent to Clark followed in due course thereon. Clark thereupon sold the land to appellants, and, basing their rights upon said transfer, they have brought this action in ejectment. The deed from Clark to his wife was recorded in the recorder's office of Lassen county prior to the making of the second deed to the aforesaid plaintiffs.

It is not necessary to determine the character or amount of interest in this realty that passed to the wife under the deed from her husband. Whether he had any title at that time that could be transferred is immaterial, for his deed was such as to convey all after-acquired title, and when his right eventually ripened into a perfect title, by the issuance of the patent, such title passed to his grantee, regardless of any intervening deed given by him to other grantees with notice by them of the prior deed. The application of this elementary principle of law to the facts before us disposes of the entire case, unless Clark's deed to his wife was made in violation of section 2263 of the Revised Statutes. That section provides: "Prior to any notice being made under and by virtue of the provisions of section 2259, proof of the settlement and improvement thereby required shall be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which such lands lie agreeably to such rules as may be prescribed by the secretary of the interior; and all assignments and transfers of the right hereby secured prior to the issuing of the patent shall be null and void." It is upon the last clause of this section that plaintiffs stand, and insist that the deed to Mary Clark was void and carried no title.

Do the facts of this case bring it within the prohibition above stated? We think clearly not, especially in view of the construction given this provision of the statute by the supreme court of the United States. The case of Myers v. Croft, 13 Wall. 291, in all respects is similar to the case at bar, and this provision of the statute was there construed with a view to carry out the legislative intention, and in disregard of its strict letter. In accordance with this principle, it was held that the interdiction found in the statute was only intended to apply to a transfer of the right of pre-emption. The court there said: "The object of congress was attained when the pre-emptor went with clean hands to the land office, and proved up his right, and paid the government for his land. Restriction upon the power of alienation after this would injure the pre-emptor, and conserve no important purpose of public policy." And again: "Instead of this, the legislation was directed against the assignment or transfer of the right secured by the act, which was the right of pre-emption, leaving the pre-emptor free to sell his land after the entry, if at that time he was in good faith the owner of the land, and had done nothing inconsistent with the provisions of the law on the subject." Measured by this construction of the statute, the present case discloses no violation of its terms; and Clark had the legal right to make the transfer to his wife at the time he made it. At that time he had done all that the law demanded of him, and had done nothing prohibited by the law. He had made the affidavit required by the statute, and had made it truthfully. He had paid the purchase price, and in all respects had made his final proof. The law demanded no further act from him, and the government had but one duty to perform, and that was to issue his certificate of purchase and the patent based thereon. That such is the fact is evident, for subsequently Clark did nothing more; and the patent was issued upon the original proof and affidavit. It is thus apparent that at the date of the deed to Mrs. Clark his original right of pre-emption had ripened into a right much more substantial and valuable. Under the authority of Myers v. Croft, and upon principles of sound reason, we think the assignment and transfer contemplated by this section is an assignment and transfer made before final proof, and before the taking of the affidavit prescribed by section 2262 of the United States statutes. The fact that the court failed to find upon the statute of limitations set up by respondents is a matter entirely immaterial to appellants.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

VALENTINE v. SLOSS et al. (No. 15,432.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

PUBLIC LANDS — CONFIRMATION OF MEXICAN GRANT—ORDER FOR SURVEY—LIMITATIONS.

1. Where the decree of the circuit court confirming a claim to lands in California under a Mexican grant describes the land as bounded by the "shore of the bay," and the description by courses and distances includes the land to ordinary high tide, the ordinary high-tide line will be the boundary, though "shore," under the Mexican law, extended only to the extraordinary high-tide line, and the Mexican grant described the land as bounded by the shore, as words used in a common-law court decree must be given the common-law interpretation.

2. A patent issued by the United States land office to land claimed under a Mexican grant cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that it includes land not included in the decree of the district court confirming the grant.

3. When the survey of land claimed under a Mexican grant was approved by the surveyor general before the passage of Act June 14, 1860, which gives the United States district courts jurisdiction to order such surveys into court on application of any interested party, and no proceedings were pending for the purpose of contesting or reforming the same, the court had no jurisdiction to order such survey into court on exceptions being made thereto after the passage of the act. United States v. Sepulveda, 1 Wall. 104, followed.

4. Limitation does not begin to run against an action for the recovery of land claimed under a Mexican grant until the issuance of a patent to the claimant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Action by Thomas B. Valentine against Louis Sloss and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mullany & Grant and R. Percy Wright, for appellants. Lindley & Eickhoff, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought to recover possession of land, under section 738, Code Civ. Proc. Plaintiff claims title derived from the heirs of Juan Read, who received a grant from the Mexican government. His claim was presented to the board of land commissioners, and by them confirmed. Patent issued to the confirmees February 25, 1885, and this action was commenced February 21, 1890. This appeal is from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, made upon a statement of the case. The statement contains the following: "It appeared from other documentary evidence introduced that all of the right, title, and interest of John Read, Hilaria Read, and Ynez Read in the land described in the complaint herein had vested in the plaintiff before the commencement of this action. It was admitted by all of the parties to the action that all of the land described in the complaint in this action lies and is included within the boundaries by courses and distances as given in said patent, and as surveyed and delineated on the plat attached thereto. It was admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that all of the land described in the complaint lies between the line of extraordinary high tide and the line of the ordinary high tide of the waters of the Bay of San Francisco, as the same existed on the 2d day of October, 1834, and on the 7th day of July, 1846." It appears from the recitals contained in the patent that the claim was confirmed by the board of land commissioners June 13, 1854. In the decree of the commission the land of which confirmation was made was described as follows: "Commencing from the solar which faces west, at a point at the slope and foot of the hills which lie in that direction and on the edge of the forests of redwoods called 'Corte de Madera del Presidio,' and running from thence, in a northwardly direction, four thousand five hundred varas, to an arroyo called 'Holon,' where is another forest of redwoods, called 'Corte de Madera de San Pablo;' thence, by the waters of said arroyo and the Bay of San Francisco, ten thousand varas, to the Point Tiburon, said point serving as a mark and limit; thence running along the borders of said bay, and continuing in a westerly direction along the shore of the bay formed by Point Caballos and Point Tiburon, four thousand seven hundred varas, to the mouth of the Canada and the point of the Sausal, which is near the Estero, lying east of the house on said premises, which was occupied by said Juan Read in November, 1835; and thence continuing the measurement from east to west, along the east line, eight hundred varas, to the place of beginning,—containing one square league of land, be the same more or less." This decree was approved by the circuit court on appeal, January 14, 1856. The survey upon which the patent was based was approved by W. H. Brown, United States surveyor general for the district of California, March 24, 1883. The field notes of the survey are set out at length in the patent, and the grant therein contained recites that the United States has granted, and does give and grant, to Juan Read and others, "the tract of land embraced and described in the foregoing survey."

1. Appellants' first point is that the patent, rightly construed, does not include any portion of the salt marsh described in the complaint. It is admitted that the land described in the complaint is included within the boundaries by courses and distances, as given in the patent, and as surveyed and delineated on the map attached thereto. As the patent conveyed by express reference the land described in the survey, the admission leaves no room for this argument.

2. The second point seems to be the same differently stated. It is said that natural boundaries control courses and distances. The decree describes the land as bounded by the shore of the Bay of San Francisco; that by the civil law, which controlled in Mexico, that line was the line of extraordinary high tide. It is stipulated that the land described is between the line of extraordinary high tide and ordinary high tide. The patent contains a copy of the decree, and the survey purports to describe the same land. The survey, it is admitted, includes all the tide lands, but it is said that it shows where the lines cross the line which divides the uplands from the tidelands, "so that the patent itself affords an accurate description of the land confirmed to the grantee by the district court by simply rejecting the courses and distances after the salt marsh commences, and until the line of extraordinary high tide is reached, and following the Mexican shore of the Bay of San Francisco between the two points." It is contended that the rule laid down in More v. Massini, 37 Cal. 432, determines, in favor of defendants, that the line of the survey does not extend beyond what counsel are pleased to call the "Mexican shore." The cases, however, are not alike: (1) There were indications in the case of More v. Massini that the survey was intended to be bounded by the beach. Here there is no mistaking the fact that the survey was intended to pass the line of the Mexican shore. (2) The decree was rendered in a common-law court, and the language used must be given the meaning attached to it by the common law. And (3) the Mexican shore is not shown to be a visible and obvious natural boundary or monument.

3. The third point is that the officers of the United States land office had no authority to issue a patent for the tidelands, because these lands are plainly not included in the decree of confirmation. This question has been so often determined, and the decisions are so uniform, that it can no longer be deemed open for discussion. The following are some of the cases: Moore v. Wilkinson, 13 Cal. 478; Chipley v. Farris, 45 Cal. 527; People v. San Francisco, 75 Cal. 388, 17 Pac. 522; De Guyer v. Banning, 91 Cal. 400, 27 Pac. 761; San Francisco City and County v. Le Roy, 138 U. S. 656, 11 Sup. Ct. 364; Knight v. Land Ass'n, 142 U. S. 161, 12 Sup. Ct. 258.

4. It is contended that the court erred in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the introduction in evidence of the delivery of juridical possession. The correctness of this ruling is shown by U. S. v. Halleck, 1 Wall. 439, and Younger v. Pagles, 60 Cal. 525.

5. The last point made is that the court erred in not permitting the defendants to introduce in evidence the decree of the United States district court approving the Mathewson survey. This survey was made by R. C. Mathewson, deputy United States surveyor general for California, in 1858, and was approved by J. W. Mandeville, United States surveyor general for the district of California, September 19, 1859. It included only 4,460.24 acres, which was about the quantity called for in the grant, to wit, one square league, Spanish measure. It did not include any portion of the demanded premises. The patent includes 7,845.12 acres, which is nearer two leagues, Spanish measure, than one. The Mathewson survey was ordered into the United States district court, September 18, 1860, upon exceptions to it made at that date by the heirs of Juan Read. The exceptions were disposed of September 28, 1865, at which time the court approved the Mathewson survey. June 14, 1860, an act was passed by congress giving the district court jurisdiction upon the application of any party interested to order any such survey and plat into court, and, after due notice and proceedings, to approve or disapprove of the survey, and to direct a modification; and it was provided that "the plat and survey so finally determined by publication, order, or decree, as the case may be, shall have the same effect and validity in law as if a patent for the land had been issued by the United States." If the district court had jurisdiction to affirm the Mathewson survey, it would seem to follow that the decree of confirmation was thereby satisfied, or would be by the issuance of a patent in conformity with it, and that the land office of the United States had no authority to issue letters patent for any other land. Unfortunately, however, for appellants, the Mathewson survey was approved by the surveyor general before the passage of the act of June 14, 1860; and at that time there were no proceedings pending for the purpose of contesting or reforming the same. Section 6 of the act limited its operation, so far as surveys theretofore approved were concerned, to those which had been returned to the court, or those in which proceedings were then pending for the purpose of contesting or reforming the same. This section was construed in U. S. v. Sepulveda, 1 Wall. 104, in such way as to show that the district court had no jurisdiction, and therefore the decree was void. The ruling was therefore correct.

The statute of limitations was pleaded, and, in a separate brief on the part of certain defendants, it is contended that plaintiff's claim is barred, notwithstanding the fact that the suit was commenced within five years after the issuance of the patent, because, it is said, plaintiff and his grantors could at all times have maintained ejectment upon this title. This position finds some support in the first decision in San Jose v. Trimble, 41 Cal. 536. The views first announced in that case were modified on rehearing, and were practically repudiated in Gardiner v. Miller, 47 Cal. 570, since which decision it has been uniformly held that the statute does not begin to run until the issuance of the patent. It is not necessary to say what would have been the effect upon the bar of the statute had there been a valid decree approving the survey under the act of congress of June 14, 1860. The judgment and order are affirmed.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action to recover the possession of land, brought under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The title of plaintiff is derived from Juan Reed, who claimed the land under a grant from the Mexican government. The claim was duly presented to the board of land commissioners, and was confirmed. Patent was issued to the confirmees February 25, 1885. This action was commenced February 21, 1890. That the land is wholly within the exterior boundaries of the grant, as described in the patent, is not disputed, nor is it denied that plaintiff has succeeded to whatever rights the confirmees had to the land. The land lies wholly above the line of ordinary high-water mark of the Bay of San Francisco, as the same existed at the date of the grant and at all times since. Some of the defendants claim title under patents issued by the state of California under the Arkansas act. Some claim under conveyances from the board of tide land commissioners of the state of California, acting under an act entitled "An act to survey and dispose of certain salt marsh and tide lands belonging to the state of California," approved April 1, 1870. Others claim under patents of the United States conveying the lands as parts of the public domain of the United States. Some of the defendants have since 1872 been in the actual possession of the tracts described in their respective answers, and their possession has been such as would set in motion the statute of limitations, and plaintiff's right of action as to them is barred if the statute commenced to run in their favor before the issuance of the patent to plaintiff's grantors. The lands held under patents from the state as swamp lands are salt marsh and tide lands, and are all between extreme high-water line and the line of ordinary high water. The grant was bounded by the Bay of San Francisco, and, it is contended, under the Mexican law such grants extended only to the line of extraordinary high tide; that the decree of confirmation followed the language of the grant, bounding the land upon the Bay of San Francisco. The decree also contained the following proviso: "Provided, that the quantity of one square league now confirmed be contained within the boundaries called for in the grant and the map to which the grant refers, and, if there be less than that quantity, then we confirm to the claimants that less quantity." One league, Spanish measure, was about 4,440 acres. The patent includes 7,845 acres, and, as already stated, extends beyond the line of the highest tides, to include the tide lands claimed by the defendants. It is claimed that, by thus including in the survey and patent land plainly not within the boundaries described in the decree of confirmation, the executive officers exceeded their authority, and that the patent is as to such land void. This question has been so often determined adversely to the contention of appellants that it can no longer be considered an open question. It is a federal question, and has been determined by those courts. The following are some of the cases: Moore v. Wilkinson, 13 Cal. 488; Chipley v. Farris, 45 Cal. 539; People v. San Francisco, 75 Cal. 397, 17 Pac. 522; De Guyer v. Banning, 91 Cal. 402, 27 Pac. 761; San Francisco City and County v. Le Roy, 138 U. S. 656, 11 Sup. Ct. 364; Knight v. Association, 142 U. S. 142, 12 Sup. Ct. 258. The position taken by the defendants as to the running of the statute of limitations finds some support in the case of San Jose v. Trimble, 41 Cal. 536. The views first announced in that case were somewhat modified on rehearing, and were practically repudiated in Gardiner v. Miller, 47 Cal. 570, since which decision it has been uniformly held that the statute does not begin to run until the patent has been issued. It does not appear that the survey of the rancho had been judicially approved under the act of congress to regulate the jurisdiction of district courts of the United States in California, dated June 14, 1860. I advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

MORTGAGE — PAYMENT OF TAX—INVALID AGREEMENT BY MORTGAGOR—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Under Const. art. 13, § 5, which provides that all contracts requiring the mortgagor to pay any tax on the mortgage shall be void as to any interest specified therein, and as to such tax, a provision in a mortgage that the mortgagee may include in the mortgage all taxes and assessments on the premises, "including taxes on the interest of the mortgagee therein by reason of the mortgage," renders the mortgage void as to the interest on the notes secured thereby.

2. The fact that the mortgagee did not attempt to make the mortgagor pay the tax on the mortgage is immaterial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by one Garms against Jensen and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment declaring defendant Upton's mortgage a prior lien, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

J. Marion Brooks, for appellant. H. E. & F. J. Upton, J. M. Voss, and Willis & Appel, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff seeks herein the foreclosure of a mortgage executed to him by the defendants Jensen, bearing date June 20, 1889, and made Mrs. Upton, one of the respondents herein, a party defendant, under the allegation that she claimed some interest in the premises, subject to the lien of the plaintiff's mortgage. A cross complaint was filed on behalf of Mrs. Upton, in which she alleged that the defendant Jensen had executed to her a mortgage upon the same premises on the 10th day of January, 1889, which was a lien thereon prior to that of the plaintiff, and asked a judgment for its foreclosure, and that out of the proceeds of sale the amount of her claim should be paid prior to that of the plaintiff. To her cross complaint was annexed a copy of the mortgage, which contained a provision that in case of foreclosure the mortgage "may include in such foreclosure a reasonable counsel fee, to be fixed by the court, together with all payments made by the mortgagee for taxes and assessments on said premises, including taxes on the interest of the mortgagee therein by reason of this mortgage, and for the insurance of the buildings on said premises, and for any adverse claims to the mortgaged property, all of which payments the mortgagee is hereby authorized to make, and the same, with interest thereon at the same rate as said promissory note, shall be deemed to be secured by this mortgage, and payable to the mortgagee, in U. S. gold coin, out of the proceeds of the sale under said foreclosure." The plaintiff filed a general demurrer to this cross complaint, and, his demurrer having been overruled, he filed an answer, in which he averred that this provision contravened the provisions of the constitution and laws of this state, by reason of which his mortgage became a first lien upon the land. The court below held that the provision was not in violation of any provision of the constitution or laws of this state, and rendered a judgment in favor of Mrs. Upton for the full amount of the principal and interest upon the note for which the mortgage was given as security, and that her claim be first paid out of the proceeds from the sale of said property. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed directly upon the judgment roll alone.

The foregoing provision in the mortgage to Mrs. Upton does not differ materially from the provision in the mortgage which was under consideration in Harralson v. Barrett, 99 Cal. 607, 34 Pac. 342. In that case the provision with reference to the payment of the tax on the mortgage was almost identical in terms with the provision in the present mortgage, the agreement being that in case of foreclosure the mortgagee might include therein all payments made by him "for taxes on said premises, and the taxes of this mortgage, or the money hereby secured," and in the present case the agreement is that he may include in such foreclosure all payments made by him "for taxes and assessments on said premises, including taxes on the interest of the mortgagee therein by reason of this mortgage." It was held in that case that this provision in the mortgage fell within the penalty of section 5 of article 13 of the constitution, and that the plaintiff should not have been allowed any interest on the note for the payment of which the mortgage was given as security. Under the rule there established this provision in the mortgage to Mrs. Upton must be held to contravene the foregoing section of the constitution, and to be subject to the penalty therein provided. The constitution does not, however, declare that all of the provisions of the mortgage containing such agreement shall be invalid, but merely that the contract to pay the tax "shall as to any interest specified therein, and as to such tax or assessment, be null and void." The mortgage of Mrs. Upton was therefore a prior lien upon the premises, to the extent of the principal sum for which it was given, but it was void "as to the interest specified therein," and the court erred in holding that the amount of such interest was a lien upon the premises.

The proposition of the respondent that this provision of the constitution cannot be invoked against her by the plaintiff, for the reason that she does not seek to recover for any taxes paid by her upon the mortgage, cannot be maintained. Whether the mortgagee has paid the tax or not is immaterial. The constitution does not limit the penalty to an attempt by him to enforce the payment of the mortgage tax, but affixes it to the contract itself. Its object is to prevent the making of such an agreement, and not merely to prevent its enforcement. Hence, it strikes at the agreement itself, by providing that if made it shall be void, not only as to the tax agreed to be paid, but also as to any interest specified therein.

The court below is directed to modify the judgment by deducting therefrom the amount allowed for interest upon the principal sum for which the mortgage to Mrs. Upton was executed, and as so modified the judgment will stand affirmed.

RYAN v. ALTSCHUL. (No. 15,392.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1894.)

ASSESSMENTS FOR STREET IMPROVEMENTS—VALIDITY.

Laws 1885, p. 147, § 7, subd. 1, provides that the expense of street work "shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon, except as hereinafter specifically provided." Subdivision 8 provides that, where any work mentioned in section 2 (sewers, manholes, cesspools, culverts, cross walks, crossings, curbing, grading curbing, piling, and capping excepted) is done on one side of the center line of streets, the lots fronting on that side only shall be assessed to cover the expenses of the work. Held that, where an assessment included charges for macadamizing as well as grading and curbing, the imposition of the whole expense of grading and curbing on a lot on one side of the street renders the whole assessment void, not only as to the grading and curbing, but also as to the macadamizing.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by James Ryan against Ludwig Altschul to recover for improving a street in front of defendant's lot. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On the 11th day of June, 1888, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco made and passed a resolution of intention declaring their intention to order "redwood curbs, plank sidewalks, and rock gutters to be laid on the southerly side of Post street, commencing at the southwesterly corner of Broderick and Post streets, for a distance of 275 feet; and that the southerly one-half of the roadway opposite to the above-described portion of Post street be regraded and remacadamized." In regular course of the procedure thus inaugurated, the board ordered the work to be done February 11, 1889, and March 18, 1889, awarded to plaintiff a contract for the work. Plaintiff duly entered into a contract with the street superintendent, and proceeded to do the work, and on May 8, 1889, the assessment upon which this suit is brought was made and assigned to him. The specifications stated: "That portion of Post street is to be graded by the removal of all loose sand or earth until the old macadam shall have been reached, or to a depth of not less than twelve (12) inches at the center or crown of the street should the original macadam be entirely gone." Plaintiff's bid was for macadamizing (including regrading), per square foot, 5¾ cents; for sidewalks, per front foot, $1.20; for curbs, per lineal foot, 25 cents,—which shows that the grading was charged for in the charge for macadamizing. The assessment was:

275 lineal feet redwood curbs, at $0.25 per foot	68 75
275 front feet plank sidewalk, at $1.20 per foot	330 00
Printing	94 20

The diagram shows one lot assessed, to wit, defendant's lot on the south side of the street, 275 feet frontage. It is contended that the assessment is void; that it charges defendant with the entire cost of grading and curbing, while the law required that the expense of this work should be assessed upon the lots fronting upon the work on both sides of the street. Subdivision 1, § 7, of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147) provides that the expense of street work "shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon, except as hereinafter specifically provided." Subdivision 8 of that section reads as follows: "Where any work mentioned in section 2 of this act (sewers, manholes, cesspools, culverts, cross walks, crossings, curbing, grading curbing, piling and capping excepted) is done on one side of the center line of said streets, lanes, alleys, places or courts, the lots or portions of the lots fronting on that side only shall be assessed to cover the expenses of said work, according to the provisions of this section." Whether other parts of the street within this block had been graded, macadamized, curbed, or otherwise constructed the record does not disclose. It is difficult to discover any reason for putting curbing or grading in the list of exceptions in subdivision 8, and this was changed by the amendment to the act made in 1889. The proceedings here had been commenced and had proceeded up to the reception of plaintiff's bid before that act was passed. In that act it was expressly provided "that any work or proceedings commenced under the act of which this is amendatory shall in no wise be affected thereby, but shall in all respects be finished and completed thereunder, and this act shall in no wise affect such work or proceedings." The effect of a street assessment is to put a burden upon a property holder against his will. No such lien can be put upon his property save by a substantial compliance with all the provisions of the statute, and in no way can a burden be put upon him against the provisions of the statute. We may not be able to comprehend the reason for this exception as to curbing and grading, but the language is not ambiguous, and the legislative power is not in this court. So far as the act of grading and curbing is concerned, the assessment is illegal. Does it render the whole assessment void? The following cases seem to hold that it has that effect: Dyer v. Chase, 52 Cal. 440; Schirmer v. Hoyt. 54 Cal. 280; Donnelly v. Howard, 60 Cal. 291.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Respondent contends that appellant's only remedy was to appeal to the board of supervisors, and have a new assessment made. The same point was made in Donnelly v. Howard, supra, and expressly overruled. In fact, each of the above cases is an authority for appellant upon this question, as is also the case of Dorland v. Bergson, 78 Cal. 637, 21 Pac. 537. See, also, Dyer v. Harrison, 63 Cal. 447; Diggins v. Brown, 76 Cal. 318, 18 Pac. 373. The last two cases are utterly inconsistent with respondent's contention. Evidently, however, if he had appealed, and the board had refused relief, their conclusion could not be final, for neither as an appellate board nor otherwise can it transcend its power in making contracts to become a charge upon private property. If the assessment includes expenses which, under any circumstances, might have been a charge upon the property assessed, and the alleged error is to be determined by matters outside of the assessment itself, it has been held that the owner must first seek its correction by an appeal. McDonald v. Coniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71. If, however, the assessment is void upon its face, it does not constitute an apparent lien upon the property; and, as its invalidity is always apparent, the owner is not "aggrieved," and is not required to seek its correction by an appeal, but may defend upon this inherent invalidity, whenever an attempt is made to enforce it, or any right is asserted by virtue of its existence. An assessment is void upon its face if it purports to be for work which is not included in the contract upon which it is made, or which has not been authorized in the resolution of intention (Donnelly v. Howard, 60 Cal. 291; Partridge v. Lucas, 99 Cal. 519, 33 Pac. 1082), or if it appears from the diagram attached thereto to be upon lands which the statute does not make chargeable with the expense of the work (Parker v. Reay, 76 Cal. 103, 18 Pac. 124), or which lie outside of the district to be assessed (Schumaker v. Toberman, 56 Cal. 508). The assessment is to be regarded as an entirety, and is equally void if it appears upon its face that a portion or the whole of it is for the expense of work which is not legally chargeable upon the property assessed (Partridge v. Lucas, supra), or that the statute required a portion of the expense incurred to be assesed upon other property (Diggins v. Brown). It appears upon the face of the present assessment that the lot of the defendant is charged with a portion of the expense for the work done that the statute declares must be assessed upon other lots, and which cannot, under any circumstances, be imposed upon the lot of the defendant. It must, therefore, be regarded as invalid for any purpose. The judgment and order are reversed.

RAUB v. LOS ANGELES TERMINAL RY. CO. (No. 19,317.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1894.)

CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for personal injuries, it appeared that defendant had a station in Los Angeles known as D., and that it was on defendant's time-table, and that trains all stopped there for passengers; that plaintiff was in the habit of traveling from a point outside of Los Angeles to this station, and that she had been told by the conductor that all trains stopped there, though the tickets sold were to Los Angeles, and did not mention the station; that on the day in question one of defendant's trains, on which plaintiff was traveling, stopped a short distance beyond the station, and while she was alighting the train started, without warning, and threw her to the ground. Held, that a nonsuit was improperly granted.

Action by Sarah Raub against Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company to recover damages for personal injuries. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. L. Murphey, for appellant. Burnett & Gibbon, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff took passage upon a car of the defendant to be transported from Glendale to De Camp station. De Camp station is a station upon the road of the defendant within the limits of the city of Los Angeles, and is printed upon the published time-table and list of its stations. The defendant does not issue tickets from Glendale for that station, but for all stations or stopping places within the limits of Los Angeles tickets are sold to Los Angeles. The trains of the defendant always stop at this station, and passengers are accustomed to get off and on at that place. The plaintiff had frequently taken passage from Glendale, and got off and on at this station, and had been informed by the conductor that he always stopped there. On the morning of May 6, 1892, she purchased a ticket at Glendale for Los Angeles, and took passage on the defendant's road. When the train reached De Camp station, it stopped a short distance beyond the platform, and while the plaintiff was in the act of getting off, and had reached the lower step of the car, the train started without any warning, and she was thrown to the ground, and received injuries for which this action was brought. At the trial the court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff has appealed.

We think that the nonsuit should not have been granted. Whether the plaintiff was entitled to a recovery depended upon her ability to show that her injury resulted from negligence on the part of the defendant. The negligence of the defendant in the present case was not attempted to be shown by any single act or omission on its part, of which the import or character was in no respect uncertain, but it was an ultimate fact resulting from other facts and circumstances in the case, and was to be ascertained upon a consideration of these facts and circumstances viewed in connection with the respective relations of the parties. In such a case the issue of negligence is so much a question of fact, or is so dependent upon the determination of controverted facts, that its existence must be left to the jury. It is the duty of a railroad corporation to afford a reasonable time for passengers to alight from its cars at the station to which it has assumed to carry them, and if a passenger is injured while attempting to alight at such station, by reason of the sudden and unannounced starting of the train, the burden is thrown upon the company of showing that the injury was not the result of its own act or negligence. The defendant's permission to its passengers to get on and off its trains at De Camp station would counteract its claim that the plaintiff was negligent in attempting to get off at that station, and the fact that passage tickets which it sold for Los Angeles were recognized by it as equally available for all stations within the limits of Los Angeles must be considered as a permission, if not an invitation, to get off at any of those stations. The defendant cannot avail itself of the failure of the conductor to announce the station before reaching it as evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The evidence tended to show that it was a regular station upon the road, at which passengers were wont to get on and off every day, and, as the plaintiff had always been informed by the conductor that he always stopped there, she was authorized to consider the stopping of the train at the station as an invitation by the defendant to get off. We held in Carr v. Railroad Co., 98 Cal. 366, 33 Pac. 213, that it was not negligence per se for a passenger to get off from a moving train that had carried him beyond the station called for by his ticket; and, under the principles of that case, it cannot be considered to have been negligence on the part of the plaintiff herein to attempt to get off from the train after it had stopped at a point beyond the platform. Under the principles of that case, the question of the plaintiff's negligence should have been submitted to the jury. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

GRANNIS v. LORDON. (No. 19,378.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1894.)

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Granting or continuing preliminary injunctions is a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and will be disturbed only for abuse of discretion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by R. W. Grannis against M. H. Lordon to quiet title and to enjoin defendant from interfering with plaintiff's possession. From a decree dissolving the injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Appel, for appellant. John T. Jones, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to quiet the plaintiff's title to a certain 40-acre tract of land in Los Angeles county. Upon filing the complaint, a preliminary injunction was issued, restraining the defendant from interfering with the plaintiff's possession of the said land. The defendant answered, denying all the equities set up in the complaint, and alleging that the said land was unsurveyed government land, and that he had been in the actual possession of the same, and had cultivated a portion of it, for more than two years prior to the filing of the complaint. He afterwards moved for a dissolution of the injunction, and based the motion upon his verified answer, and nine affidavits. At the hearing, the plaintiff filed a counter affidavit made by himself, and the affidavits of several other parties who deposed that the reputation for truth and veracity of one of the affiants for the defendant was bad, and that they would not believe him under oath. After due consideration, the court below granted the defendant's motion, and dissolved the injunction, and from that order the plaintiff appeals.

The dissolution or continuance of a preliminary injunction is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and, unless it appears from the records in the case that the discretion has been abused, the action of the court will not be disturbed on appeal. Rogers v. Tennant, 45 Cal. 184; Patterson v. Santa Cruz, 50 Cal. 344; Parrott v. Floyd, 54 Cal. 534; White v. Nunan, 60 Cal. 406. After carefully going over the record presented in this case, we fail to see that the court below in any way abused its discretion in making the order appealed from. We advise, therefore, that the order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

LOS ANGELES CEMETERY ASS'N v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (No. 19,337.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1894.)

CITY—GRADING STREETS—CULVERTS FOR SURFACE WATERS.

1. Where surface water, owing to the natural conformation of the country, has formed for itself a definite channel, in which it is accustomed to flow, a city is bound to build culverts, sufficient to discharge the ordinary flow of water, in grading streets.

2. Where a city, under the superintendence of a competent engineer, builds a culvert sufficient to discharge the ordinary quantity of surface water flowing through a definite channel, it is not liable when, because of a flood caused by an unusually heavy rain, the culvert is unable to discharge the water, and lands are overflowed.

3. In an action against a city for damages by the construction of an embankment across an alleged water way, plaintiff asked the court to submit to the jury the question of whether the embankment caused the water which "naturally" flowed down the water way to overflow, etc. The question was submitted with the substitution of the word "ordinarily" for "naturally." Held not error, as in a deluge all water naturally flows to a lower level, and defendant was bound to provide for only such water as ordinarily flowed.

4. In such an action, evidence of freshets occurring after the action was brought is not admissible, as the necessity for providing for the discharge of water in the construction of the embankment could only be predicated on past experience.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Cemetery Association against the city of Los Angeles for damages for constructing an embankment over an alleged water way, whereby their lands were overflowed. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Hudson and M. C. Hester, for appellant. C. McFarland, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The plaintiff and appellant here is a corporation, and the owner of some 35 acres of land situate within the city of Los Angeles and devoted to the purposes of a cemetery. The action is brought against the city of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by the construction of an embankment across an alleged water course, near to and below the cemetery, in which a culvert was constructed of such small size, and at such an elevation above the natural surface, that it was insufficient and unable to carry off the water which in time of storms flows down said water course, whereby the water was backed up upon and over a portion of said cemetery grounds, depositing mud, débris, and filth thereon, and rendering such portion of said grounds unfit for cemetery purposes, and causing a deposit of mud, etc., washed from adjoining land, in an artificial lake owned by plaintiff in said cemetery grounds. The answer denied the material allegations of the complaint. Defendant had a general verdict in its favor. There were also submitted to the jury certain special issues, at the request of the respective parties, upon which they found. The appeal is from a final judgment in favor of defendant.

The following are the special issues submitted to the jury, with their answers thereto:

"Special issues by plaintiff: The jury are instructed to answer the following questions of fact: '(1) Is there and has there been, during the time plaintiff owned said land, a natural water course for the passage of storm water, extending across a portion of said land, through which a large amount of water naturally runs whenever a heavy fall of rain occurs? Ans. There is. (2) Did the defendant cause an embankment to be constructed across said water course immediately below the line of said land of plaintiff, tending to obstruct the natural flow of water therein, without providing a sufficient culvert or passage through the same for the storm water that ordinarily flows down said water course? Ans. It did not. (3) Did the said embankment across said water course, at any time within the two years immediately prior to the 21st day of November, 1891, cause the storm water that ordinarily flowed down said water course to overflow an artificial lake on plaintiff's said premises? Ans. It did not.' '(5) Did said embankment, within the time mentioned in the last question, cause the said waters to overflow any of the lots of land laid out in said grounds for cemetery purposes? Ans. It did.' '(7) If you answer that said waters were so caused to overflow any of said cemetery lots, then what damage, if any, did plaintiff sustain by reason of the overflow of said cemetery lots? Ans. No damage.'

"Special issues presented to the jury at the request of the defendant: '(1) Was the filling up of First street caused by the grading of the street by the city authorities? Answer. It was. (2) Was the water which was backed up on plaintiff's property water of a running stream, running in a channel between well-defined banks? Answer. No. (3) Was the water which was backed up upon plaintiff's property surface water caused by a rain? Answer. Yes. (4) Was the culvert across First street of sufficient size to carry off the ordinary flow of surface water? Answer. Yes. (5) Was the city official who designed the culvert a person competent to judge of the size and dimensions which the same should be constructed? Answer. Yes. (6) Was the culvert constructed in a good workmanlike manner? Answer. Yes.' '(8) Was the overflow caused by an extraordinary or unusual rain? Answer. Yes. (9) Could plaintiffs have prevented their ground from being overflowed or damaged by filling up their property to a level with the grade of the street? Answer. No. (10) Did water flow across plaintiff's premises at any other time except in times of rains or floods? Answer. No.'

"[Indorsed:] Filed March 21, 1893."

A water course is defined to be "a running stream of water; a natural stream, including rivers, creeks, runs, and rivulets." Black, Law Dict. tit. "Water Course." There must be a stream usually flowing in a particular direction, though it need not flow continually. It may sometimes be dry. It must flow in a definite channel, having a bed, sides, or banks, and usually discharge itself into some other stream or body of water. It must be something more than a mere surface drainage over the entire face of a tract of land, occasioned by unusual freshets or other extraordinary causes. It does not include the water flowing in the hollows or ravines in land, which is the mere surface water from rain or melting snow, and is discharged through them from a higher to a lower level, but which at other times are destitute of water. Such hollows or ravines are not, in legal contemplation, water courses. Ang. Water Courses, pp. 3-7; Shields v. Arndt, 7 N. J. Eq. 234; Hoyt v. City of Hudson, 27 Wis. 656; Luther v. Winnisimet Co., 9 Cush. 171; Washb. Easem. §§ 209, 210. The complaint does not in terms aver that the stream in question is a natural water course. The allegation is that it is "a natural water course for the passage of storm water, extending across a portion of the said lot two, over which a large amount of water naturally runs whenever a heavy fall of rain occurs."

The first finding submitted to the jury by plaintiff, upon which they found in the affirmative, is in almost the exact language of this allegation. As will be seen, the subsequent findings establish the following propositions: (1) The water which backed upon plaintiff's land was not that of a running stream running in a channel between well-defined banks. (2) It was surface water caused by rain. (3) Water did not flow across plaintiff's premises except in times of rain or floods. These findings are supported by the evidence, and show that the alleged stream is not a water course. In order to constitute a water course, "it must have a source independent of that fitful and occasional character that results from the falling of rain or the melting of snow." Wood, Nuis. (3d Ed.) p. 415, citing Eulrich v. Richter, 37 Wis. 226; Barnes v. Sabron, 10 Nev. 217; Shields v. Arndt, supra, and many other cases, are to like effect. "And this would be the case," says Wood, at page 416, "so far as water arising from the melting of snow and the falling of rain is concerned, even though at such seasons it took a definite channel." Indeed, it may be said that in all regions of country having a broken surface, and subject to heavy rainfall, surface water does make for itself or assume definite channels in seeking, pursuant to the law of gravitation, a lower level. The law may be thus stated:

1. At common law, no natural easement or servitude existed, as between conterminous owners of land, in favor of the owner of the superior or higher land and against the owner of the lower tenement, for the flow of mere surface water, or such as falls or accumulates by rains or the melting of snow; and the proprietor of the inferior or lower tenement or estate might, at his option, lawfully obstruct or hinder the flow of such surface water thereon, and in so doing might turn it back or off of his own lands, and onto and over the lands of other proprietors, without liability by reason of such obstruction or diversion.

2. Under the civil law, the owner of the upper or dominant estate had a natural easement or servitude in the lower or servient estate to discharge all surface waters falling or accumulating on his higher land upon or over the lower lands of the servient owner as they were accustomed to flow in a state of nature; and such natural flow could not be interrupted or prevented by the lower proprietor or servient owner to the detriment or injury of the estate of the dominant proprietor. Washb. Easem. (4th Ed.) p. 573, and authorities cited; Hoyt v. City of Hudson, 27 Wis. 659; Wood, Nuis. (3d Ed.) § 385; Gillham v. Railroad Co., 95 Am. Dec. 627.

3. In a considerable number of the states of our Union, California included, the doctrine of the civil law has been substituted for the common-law rule, and it is held, as in Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 347, that where two parcels of land belonging to different owners are adjacent to each other, and one is lower than the other, and the surface water from the higher tract has been accustomed by a natural flow to pass off over the lower tract, the owner of such upper tract of land has an easement to have the water flow over the land below, and the lower tract is charged with a corresponding servitude. Gray v. McWilliams, 98 Cal. 157, 32 Pac. 976.

4. The doctrine of the civil law, in reference to a servitude in the lower tenement in favor of the upper or dominant tenement, for the flow of surface water, had no application to lots held in cities and towns, where changes and alterations in the surface were essential to the enjoyment of such lots; and this rule has been very generally adopted in this country. Ogburn v. Connor, supra, at page 351, and cases there cited; Corcoran v. City of Benicia, 96 Cal. 1, 30 Pac. 798; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 1039–1044.

5. An apparent exception to the general rule that municipal corporations, in the grading and improvement of streets, are not bound to provide for the escape of mere surface water, has been hinted at in some of the cases, and established in others, in that class of cases where the surface water, owing to the conformation of the adjacent country, has formed for itself a definite channel in which it is accustomed to flow, in which cases it is held, as in Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 45, 7 Pac. 41, that the municipal corporation had no right, pursuant to a general plan for the grading and improvement of Montgomery avenue, to erect a solid embankment, without a culvert or water way, so as to obstruct the flow of a water course which flowed in a well-defined channel, although it served only to discharge the drainage or surface water from the adjacent hills, and, according to the statement of the case, did not come within the common-law definition of a water course. Hoyt v. City of Hudson, at pages 663 and 664; Dill. Mun. Corp. subd. 3, §§ 1051 and 1051a; Lehn v. City and County of San Francisco, 66 Cal. 76, 4 Pac. 965; Corcoran v. City of Benicia, 96 Cal. 1, 30 Pac. 798; Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214; Palmer v. Waddell, 22 Kan. 352.

In the case last quoted, it was said: "The rule that the owner of a tract of land may obstruct the flow of surface water across his land appears to and does have an exception, which is where surface water having no definite source is supplied by the falling rains and melting snow from a hilly region or high bluffs, and, owing to the natural formation of the surface of the ground, is forced to seek an outlet through a gorge or ravine, and by its flow assumes a definite or natural channel, and escapes through such channel regularly during the spring months of every year, and in seasons of heavy rains; and such has always been the case, so long as the memory of man runs;" and it was held that such channel so far possessed the attributes of a water course that the owner of lands through which such water course ran could not lawfully turn the flow upon adjacent lands to their injury and damage.

The facts of this case bring it within the exception stated. It therefore remains to inquire whether, conceding the case within the exception noted, the municipal corporation is liable. It appears that as early as 1885 the board of public works recommended to the city council that the superintendent of streets be instructed to lay a cement pipe 30 inches in diameter across Alviso (now First) street at the point in question. The matter was for some cause referred back to the board and city engineer, and on the 10th day of November, 1885, they reported to the council, recommending a brick culvert, which report was adopted, and a culvert of brick, say 70 feet in length, and 30 inches in diameter, was in 1886 or 1887 constructed across the street, and a fill of, say, 5 feet was made over the culvert to bring the street up to grade. The evidence tends to show that the work was well done, according to a regular plan, and in accordance with lawful municipal authority in the necessary improvement of the street, and that the city engineer was a competent person. The culvert served to carry all the water coming down the ravine until about Christmas, 1889, when, in consequence of an unusually heavy rain, a flood came, and the culvert, although in good order, proved insufficient to carry the water, and it was backed up over a portion of the cemetery grounds, with the result as complained of, or found by the jury. But three witnesses testified as to the character of the flood. One said: "The flood of 1889 was an extraordinary flood. * * * The brick culvert through First street was not large enough to let the water of heavy rains through." Another testified: "I remember the rains about Christmas of 1889. They were unusually heavy. So much water came down the ravine where I live that we thought there had been a cloudburst. I have lived in Los Angeles over thirty years, and never saw as heavy a rain as the storm about Christmas, 1889." The third testified he had lived in Los Angeles many years, had noticed the rainfall, and never saw such a rainfall in as short a space of time as that of Christmas, 1889.

Assuming, as was said by Chief Justice Gray, in Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344: "If a city or town negligently constructs or maintains the bridges or culverts in a highway across a navigable river or a natural water course so as to cause the water to flow back upon and injure the land of another, it is liable to an action of tort to the same extent that any corporation or individual would be liable for doing similar acts,"—and still we fail to see, in the face of the findings here, how the defendant can be held liable. A municipal corporation is not liable at common law for the consequential damages of authorized acts. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 989. The findings of the jury negative the charge of negligence in the construction or maintenance of the sewer built by the defendant. Where, as in the present case, the overflow was occasioned by an extraordinary flood, which could not have been reasonably foreseen, it does not at common law give a right of action, and does not constitute a damage to private property for a public use, within the purview of section 14 of article 1 of our state constitution. If the immediate, direct, and necessary effect of the embankment had been to damage plaintiff's property, it might with propriety be said the liability of the defendant would arise, under the constitution; but for an unforeseen calamity, beyond the ken of human foresight, without the pale of previous experience, there is no such liability.

The court did not err in striking out from the issue presented to the jury (No. 3), at the request of plaintiff, the word "naturally," and inserting the word "ordinarily." No doubt the water, in case of a deluge, "naturally" flows to a lower level through fixed channels or otherwise, but it was the water which "ordinarily" flowed in times of storm for which defendant was bound to provide. Had the evidence showed that the water way in question had previously been subject to great freshets, it would have been the duty of defendant to provide adequate means to meet them; but there was no such showing. Mayor, etc., of City of New York v. Bailey, 2 Denio, 433.

The evidence offered to show that an equally great freshet had occurred in the same place in 1891, and after this action was brought, was inadmissible. The experience which dictated to defendant the necessary size of the culvert to accomplish the object in view was that of the past, at the date of its construction, and the possibilities or probabilities of the future could reasonably be predicated only upon the past, subject, of course, to such future changes as experience might dictate to be reasonably necessary.

The fourth instruction given by the court at the request of defendant, to the effect that if the injury to plaintiff was caused by the grading of a public street to its established grade, and that plaintiff could grade its property so as to conform to the established grade, whereby the surface water would flow off, and not stand upon, its property, the plaintiff could not recover, was erroneous, as applied to the facts of the case. Such is no doubt the rule as to ordinary surface water, but it has no application to a case where surface water assumes the form of a regular stream or water course, and comes within the exception hereinbefore stated. The error, however, caused no injury to the plaintiff, as the jury found specially that plaintiff could not have prevented its ground from overflow by filling it to grade.

The objections to other instructions need not be specially noticed, for the reason that if erroneous, and if a general verdict had been found in favor of plaintiff, it would have been controlled by the facts specially found by the jury, upon which facts it would have been the duty of the court to have entered a judgment in favor of the defendant, notwithstanding such general verdict in favor of plaintiff. Code Civ. Proc. § 625. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

SUBORNATION OF PERJURY—INDICTMENT—WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

1. An indictment for subornation of perjury, which alleges that defendant, in the contest of a will in which I. was contestant, procured one N. to falsely swear that she, said N., was the wife of the testator, and does not allege that I. and N. were the same person, is insufficient, as it does not show that the testimony was material.

2. Such an indictment, which alleges that the witness defendant procured did "falsely" and "contrary to her oath" swear, etc., is insufficient, as it should allege that the witness did so "willfully" and "knowingly."

3. Such an indictment must not only allege that defendant knew that the testimony of the witness would be false, but also that the witness knew her testimony was false also.

4. Defects of substance in an indictment are not cured by a failure to demur.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

A. J. Ross was convicted of subornation of perjury, and appeals. Reversed.

A. V. Scanlan, Nicol & Orr, and Swinnerton & Rutherford, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. The information in this case does not state a public offense. The crime with which it seeks to charge defendant is subornation of perjury, and it is well established that to constitute this offense all the essential elements constituting the crime of perjury must be stated. 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. §§ 1020, 1021; U. S. v. Wilcox, 4 Blatchf. 393, Fed. Cas. No. 16,693; Coyne v. People, 124 Ill. 17, 14 N. E. 668; U. S. v. Evans, 2 West Coast Rep. 611; U. S. v. Dennee, 3 Woods, 39, Fed. Cas. No. 14,947. In several essentials the information falls short of this requirement. It is lengthy, and somewhat confused, and contains much redundant matter and many immaterial recitals and repetitions, but the substance of the charge is that in a contest in the superior court of San Joaquin county of the will of one Joseph McKenney, deceased, in which Isabella McKenney was contestant, the defendant, Ross, in the interest of said contestant, and for the purpose and end of having her declared and adjudged the widow of said deceased, and entitled to share in his estate, procured one Ida Maud Nicholaus to appear as a witness at the trial, and falsely swear on behalf of said contestant, Isabella McKenney, that she, said Ida Maud Nicholaus, was married to the said Joseph McKenney in his lifetime, and was then at the time of said trial the widow of said deceased. From this it sufficiently appears, perhaps, that the issue upon which the false testimony was given was material; but it is nowhere alleged that the evidence of the suborned witness was material to that issue, nor is that fact made manifest from the evidence alleged to have been given. In one form or the other this fact must be made to appear,—either by direct averment, or by stating evidence given by the witness, which the court can judicially say was material. People v. Brilliant, 58 Cal. 218; 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 921; Com. v. Pollard, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 225; Hoch v. People, 3 Mich. 554. How can we say that the false testimony here alleged was necessarily material? It is alleged that defendant procured the witness to falsely testify that she, the witness, was the widow of the deceased, McKenney, for the purpose of establishing the fact that Isabella McKenney was the widow of the deceased. This testimony would not have any necessary tendency to prove that fact, and, if not, it would not be necessarily material. If the fact had been alleged, which appears elsewhere in the record, that Ida Maud Nicholaus and Isabella McKenney, the contestant, were one and the same person, the materiality of the evidence might be apparent on the face of the pleading; but, there being no such averment, that fact cannot be regarded in testing the sufficiency of the information.

After alleging the administration of the oath to the witness, the information then proceeds, "and said Ida Maud Nicholaus did then and there," etc., "falsely and contrary to her oath, depose, swear, testify, state," etc. (reciting the alleged false testimony). This language does not charge perjury. It is not the equivalent of saying that the witness willfully or knowingly did the act. To say that a witness testified falsely does not necessarily imply that he did it willfully or knowingly, and saying that he so testified contrary to his oath is merely to say in another form that he testified falsely. The language of the statute is, "willfully, and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matter which he knows to be false." Pen. Code, § 118. This, or language of like import, must be employed to satisfy the statute. U. S. v. Evans, supra; People v. Parsons, 6 Cal. 487.

It is further alleged that at the time of said procurement "he, the said A. J. Ross, well knew that the said Ida Maud Nicholaus would not give her evidence according to the truth, and that the said evidence so to be given by her was false, feigned, and altogether fictitious;" but it is not alleged that at the time of said procurement or the giving of said false testimony the defendant knew that the witness was aware of the falsity of her evidence. This averment was essential. The rule and its reason are well stated in U. S. v. Evans, above cited, where it is said: "To sustain an indictment for procuring a person to commit perjury it is obviously necessary that perjury has in fact been committed. It cannot be committed unless the person taking the oath not only swears to what was false, but does so willfully and knowingly. He who procures another to commit perjury must not only know that the statements to be sworn to are false, but also that the person who is to swear to them knew them to be false; for, unless the witness has that knowledge, the intent to swear falsely is wanting, and he commits no perjury. It is, therefore, essential that the indictment should aver not only that the statements made by the witness were false in fact, and that he knew them to be false, but also that the party procuring him to make those statements knew that they would be intentionally and willfully false on the part of the witness, and thus the crime of perjury would be committed by him." The several defects in the information above pointed out, being matters of substance, and not of form, were not waived by failure to demur (Pen. Code, §§ 1004, 1012, 1185), and, being fatal to its sufficiency, the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment should have been granted. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to arrest its judgment.

GRAY v. LONG et al. (No. 18,237.)

SALE—VALIDITY—ACTION FOR PRICE.

1. Plaintiff sold to defendant certain trees. It was provided that, on account of a disease with which the trees were affected, a certain percentage should be excepted. Defendant selected the trees, and they were shipped to him in another county. On account of an ordinance of the county to which the trees were shipped, adopted after the sale, defendant was prohibited from planting therein any of the trees which were diseased, and returned the same to plaintiff, who refused to receive them. Held, that plaintiff could recover for all of the trees selected by and shipped to defendant.

2. The fact that an ordinance of a county to which trees are shipped prohibits the planting of any diseased trees therein does not invalidate a sale of trees as to any diseased ones included therein, where the sale was made in another county before the ordinance was adopted.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by H. P. Gray against one Long and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank H. Short, for appellants. George E. Church, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff and the appellants made the following agreement at Armona, in the county of Tulare, December 2, 1891: "This is to certify that I have this day sold Long Bros. & Co., of Fresno county, California, all my budded one year old nursery stock, amounting in all to about 25,000 trees, except what I wish for my own use, to the amount of 5,000 trees, more or less, assorted, and 10 per cent. deduction for black knot; trees to be f. o. b. cars at Armona, Cal., at the rate per tree of 14 cents, amounting to about $2,494.80, on which I acknowledge the receipt of $500; stock to be delivered by the 1st day of January, 1892. Long Bros. & Co. agree to be on the ground to examine and accept the stock. H. P. Gray. Long Bros. & Co." On or about the 1st of January, 1892, the defendants went to the nursery of the plaintiff at Armona, and examined the stock of trees covered by the agreement, and, after such examination, accepted 15,058 of them, and the same were thereupon shipped by railroad to the defendants at Fresno. After the trees had been received at Fresno, one of the members of the county board of horticultural commissioners of Fresno county examined them, and, finding that many of them were affected with black knot, notified the defendants that the trees could not be planted in that county, and, under his directions, the defendants shipped back to the plaintiff, 6,153 of the trees. The plaintiff refused to recognize the right of the defendants to return the trees, and the defendants refused to pay for them; whereupon this action was brought to recover the amount due for all the trees that had been accepted by the defendants at the price named in the contract. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

By the terms of the contract between the parties, the plaintiff sold to the defendants his entire stock of one year old trees, reserving the right to retain about 5,000 for his own use. It was understood by them that some of the trees would be affected with black knot, and they thereupon agreed that a deduction on that account to the extent of 10 per cent. of the entire amount should be made from the stock which was sold. The contract does not provide that the trees which might be affected with black knot shall not be embraced in the sale, but that all of the trees are sold save such as were reserved for the plaintiff's use, and that a deduction of 10 per cent. shall be made on that account, whether the number of trees so affected should amount to that quantity or not. The price per tree was fixed upon this estimate, and whether the affected trees exceeded or fell below the estimate cannot change the amount which the defendants agreed to pay. This is not only the natural construction to be given to the words of the agreement, but it is the construction which the defendants themselves placed upon it when they accepted the trees. Instead of objecting to all the trees that were affected with the black knot, after those so affected had been sorted out from the others, they culled these over, and took their choice of them, in order that only 10 per cent. of the stock might remain, and accepted them in fulfillment of the contract. After the contract had been made, the county of Fresno passed an ordinance, to take effect December 30, 1891, requiring an inspection of all fruit trees that should thereafter be brought into the county, and directing the destruction or removal from the county of such as should be found to be affected with any live scale or insect pests injurious thereto. It was under the provisions of this ordinance that the defendants were directed to return to the plaintiff a portion of the trees, as above stated; and it is now urged by them that they are not liable, therefore, for such trees, upon the ground that the contract for their purchase was in violation of this ordinance. The contract, however, was not made within the county of Fresno. By its terms the sale was made, and the trees were to be delivered in pursuance thereof, within the county of Tulare; and it is not contended that there was any ordinance of the county of Tulare by which such contract would be affected. Moreover, at the time the contract was entered into, the ordinance had not been adopted in the county of Fresno. For these reasons, this contention of the appellants cannot be maintained. The judgment and order are affirmed.

QUIETING TITLE—DECREE.

In an action to quiet title, defendant denied any interest in the land, except that he held a tax certificate thereon. The court rendered judgment that plaintiff was the owner in fee, and that defendant had no interest in the land; that there was no adverse claim of defendant's to be determined in the action; and that any right which defendant might have acquired could not be determined in the action; and that defendant was entitled to costs; and that the rights of defendant under the certificate were not to be affected by the judgment. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment either refusing or granting his prayer to quiet title.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Glen county; Seth Millington, Judge.

Action by Fred Quint against John McMullin to quiet title. Judgment was rendered that plaintiff was owner in fee, and that defendant had no adverse claim which could be determined in the action, and awarded costs to defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Maxwell, Dorsey & Soto and R. A. Long, for appellant. R. Percy Wright, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to quiet title, and the complaint is in the usual form. The answer denies that the defendant claims, or has at any time claimed, to have or to own any estate or interest in the land, and avers that he claims nothing as to said land, except as disclosed by the following facts: He thereupon alleges that said lands are situated within the boundaries of Central irrigation district, and that said district is a public corporation. He further alleges in detail all the steps and proceedings leading up to and including the sale of the aforesaid land to the defendant, and the issuance of a certificate of sale thereon to him on account of an assessment, levy of a tax, and delinquent sale thereunder, for the benefit and at the instance of the aforesaid irrigation district. The case went to trial upon these pleadings, and the court made findings of fact to the effect that defendant had never claimed any interest in the said real estate, and that he now claims nothing respecting said land except that on the 16th day of October, 1893, he purchased said land at a sale of the same for delinquent assessments, etc. As conclusions of law, the court found the plaintiff to be the owner in fee; that the defendant had no estate or interest therein; that there is no adverse claim of defendant to be determined in this action; that any rights which the defendant may have acquired through his purchase at the said delinquent sale cannot be determined in this action; and that defendant is entitled to his costs. The judgment followed the conclusions of law, and plaintiff now appeals from that portion of the judgment awarding costs against him, and also from that portion reading as follows: "That any right which said defendant, John McMullin, may have acquired by or through the purchase of said pieces or parcels of land at a sale thereof on October 16, 1893, by the collector of Central irrigation district, for delinquent assessments on said pieces or parcels of land, levied on the same for the purposes of said district, is not in any manner affected or determined hereby."

The course followed by the learned judge of the trial court in the rendition of this form of judgment is certainly somewhat out of the ordinary, and the defendant's answer is likewise a pleading of peculiar construction. Respondent now insists that plaintiff is appealing from a judgment rendered in his own favor, and that the portion of the judgment from which the appeal is taken is pure surplusage, and entirely harmless. If such be the fact, we are at a loss to understand why defendant set up these things in his answer, for, believing as he does, he should have appeared, disclaimed any interest, and allowed judgment to be taken against him quieting plaintiff's title. But we think his contention is unsound. The only object of plaintiff's cause of action was to quiet his title against this delinquent assessment sale; and to quiet his title, expressly reserving as an open question the status of the property as affected by such sale, was a fruitless victory. Theoretically the judgment was in his favor; practically it decided nothing, for, after the judgment of the trial court, he knew no more as to the status of his realty than he did before he brought this action. Under the foregoing circumstances, we think, the plaintiff has a proper appeal before the court. The right of appeal is remedial in its character, and in doubtful cases the right should always be granted. Plaintiff was entitled to a judgment, without any reservations or exceptions, either refusing or granting his prayer to quiet title. The reservation in this judgment is the portion of which he makes complaint, and he is necessarily injured and aggrieved thereby, for in effect it renders the judgment in his favor a nullity. We think the principle declared in People v. Mining Co., 66 Cal. 155, 5 Pac. 1150, justifies this appeal. Inasmuch as the trial court expressly refrained from considering the merits of the special defense set up by the defendant, the merits of that defense are not before us for review; but it was the duty of the trial court to pass upon that question and all other questions raised by the pleadings, and to thereupon grant or deny plaintiff's demand that his title be quieted. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Bond on Appeal.

Where a surety on an appeal bond disposes of his property pending the appeal, the court cannot require appellant to file a new bond, in the absence of a statute authorizing it to do so.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Wm. T. Wallace, Judge.

Appeal by Julius Conradt and another from a judgment in favor of C. A. Macomber. Motion by respondent to require appellants to file a new appeal bond. Motion denied.

John H. Durst, for appellants. Henley & Swift, Henley & McSherry, and S. V. Costello, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Respondent recovered a money judgment against appellants in the superior court, and the case is pending before this court upon appeal. He now makes a motion to this court wherein he prays that an order be made requiring the appellants to forthwith file a new bond upon appeal herein, with sufficient sureties for the payment of the judgment in the above-entitled action, and that such sureties qualify before a justice of this honorable court, and in default of the filing of such bond, or in default of the sureties upon such bond to justify as may be ordered by this court, that this appeal be dismissed. In support of this motion, he filed an affidavit, the material portion of which is to the effect that Maria Conradt, one of the sureties upon the aforesaid bond and undertaking, had disposed of all her property since she qualified thereon, and that, in consequence thereof, said security had become wholly insufficient and inadequate as a guaranty for the payment of the judgment, together with costs, appealed from. No statute has been called to our attention which authorizes us in making the order here prayed for, and we know of none. For this reason, the motion and application is denied.

Judgment against Infant—Waiver of Objections.

1. A judgment rendered against an infant without the appointment of a guardian ad litem is voidable only; and if, after the judgment is entered and the infant becomes of age, he makes no objection thereto, he waives his right to make such objection.

2. An infant was one of the defendants in an action to quiet title, and no guardian ad litem for him was appointed. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and, after the infant came of age, he joined with the other defendants in a motion for a new trial, and filed his own affidavit in support thereof. The motion was denied, and, on appeal, the order denying it was affirmed. He then moved to set aside the judgment, on the ground of his infancy. Held that, by joining in the motion and appeal, he submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and was bound by the judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Barbara Childs against F. D. Lanterman, Roy S. Lanterman, and others to quiet title. Defendant Roy S. Lanterman made a motion to set aside judgment entered in favor of plaintiff, on the ground that he was an infant pending suit. Motion denied, and defendant Roy S. Lanterman appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve and M. W. Conklin, for appellant. Will D. Gould, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to quiet her title to certain lands in the county of Los Angeles, making Roy S. Lanterman, the appellant herein, one of the defendants. An answer to the complaint was filed by Stephen M. White, as attorney for all the defendants, including the appellant, and upon a trial of the cause judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. When the action was commenced, and at the time of the trial, the appellant was an infant, and did not attain his majority until July 20, 1890. No order of court was made appointing a guardian ad litem for him, and the record does not contain any evidence that the summons in the action was served upon him, although it is not alleged or shown that service was not in fact made upon him. The findings of the court were filed July 12, 1890, but the judgment, although signed as of that date, was not filed or entered until July 21st. Thereafter a motion for a new trial was made in behalf of the defendants, Roy S. Lanterman, the appellant herein, making and filing an affidavit in support thereof, and, this motion being denied, the defendants appealed from the order and also from the judgment. Upon this appeal the order and judgment were affirmed. 95 Cal. 369, 30 Pac. 553. After the remittitur had been filed in the court below, viz. March 9, 1893, a motion was made on behalf of Roy S. Lanterman to set aside the findings and judgment against him, and to strike out the answer filed on his behalf, upon the ground of his infancy at the time the answer was filed and trial had, and the want of any authority in the attorney to appear in his behalf. This motion was denied, and the present appeal is from that order.

Although it is provided in section 372, Code Civ. Proc., that, when an infant is a party, he must appear either by his general guardian or by a guardian ad litem appointed by the court, yet a judgment rendered against an infant in which no guardian ad litem has been appointed is not for that reason void (1 Black, Judgm. § 195; Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 600, 2 Pac. 418; Kemp v. Cook, 18 Md. 130); and a judgment rendered against him in an action in which he has appeared by an attorney will be upheld as fully as though he had appeared in person (Barber v. Graves, 18 Vt. 290; Marshall v. Fisher, 1 Jones [N. C.] 111; Townsend v. Cox, 45 Mo. 401). The appearance by an attorney in his behalf will be assumed as authorized by him, so far as the direction and consent of the infant can give authority (18 Mo. 138); and if, after reaching majority, he would repudiate such appearance, it is incumbent upon him, when he takes any action with reference to the judgment, to indicate his repudiation, rather than do some act which assumes that the authority was given. If he then treats the judgment as having been regularly entered, and makes no objection upon the ground of irregularity or want of jurisdiction, he waives his right thereafter to make such objection. As the judgment is not void, but is merely voidable at his instance, it may be affirmed by him; and, as in the case of any other obligation that he has assumed during infancy which is susceptible of ratification, it will be considered as affirmed by him if he takes any action in reference thereto after he comes of age, which is consistent only with assuming its validity.

At the time the judgment herein was entered, the appellant had reached his majority. He could then have sought relief therefrom upon the ground of irregularity in the service of process upon him, or want of authority in the attorney to appear for him, by reason of his infancy, instead of which, however, he moved the court for a new trial, and failing therein appealed to this court, not only from this order, but also from the judgment; and it was not until after the affirmance of that judgment (nearly three years subsequent to its entry) that his infancy at the time it was rendered was brought to the attention of the court. Nor did he upon the hearing of the present motion make any personal showing or affidavit in his own behalf, the motion having been presented through an attorney without any affidavit by himself in support thereof indicative of his desire to avoid the judgment. It is also to be observed that the appellant does not deny that the appearance of the attorney in his behalf was with his full knowledge and concurrence. We are of the opinion that by these acts the appellant submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and is bound by its judgment. It is well settled that if a defendant, though not served with process, takes such a step in an action, or seeks such relief at the hands of the court as is consistent only with the hypothesis that the court has jurisdiction of the cause and of his person, he thereby submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and is bound by its action as fully as if he had been regularly served with process. Coad v. Coad, 41 Wis. 26; Wood v. Young, 38 Iowa, 102; Crowell v. Galloway, 3 Neb. 215; Foote v. Richmond, 42 Cal. 443. "A party cannot come into court, challenge its proceedings on account of irregularities, and, after being overruled, be heard to say that he never was a party in court or bound by those proceedings. If he was not in fact a party, and had not been properly served, he can have the proceedings set aside on the ground of want of jurisdiction, but he must challenge the proceedings on that single ground. This is familiar doctrine." Burdette v. Corgan, 26 Kan. 104. The motion of the appellant herein for a new trial, and his appeal from the judgment, upon the ground that the court erred in rendering such judgment, assumed that the court had jurisdiction of him, and was a waiver of his right to question that fact. Fee v. Iron Co., 13 Ohio St. 563; Mason v. Alexander, 44 Ohio St. 329, 7 N. E. 435. The order is affirmed.

KUMLER v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY. (No. 19,463.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1894.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CLASSIFICATION OF COUNTIES—LOCAL ACTS—CENSUS OF COUNTY.

1. Laws 1893, § 235, which provides that when the population of any county shall have been reduced, by the creation of any new county from the territory thereof, below the class first assumed under the act, the supervisors of such county shall designate by order the class to which such county has been reduced, is not in conflict with Const. art. 11, § 5, which provides that the legislature, by general laws, shall classify the counties by population, as it does not delegate to supervisors the power to classify counties, but simply authorizes them to determine how many people are left within the old county after the new county is created.

2. The section is not in conflict with Const.

art. 4, § 25, which provides that the legislature shall not pass local or special laws affecting the fees or salary of any officer, as it applies to every county of the state whose class is changed.

3. In arriving at the population, the board need not be controlled by the federal census of 1890, but may determine the same from such source as it sees fit, as the matter to be determined is the population at the time of creation of the new county, and not that at the time of census.

Department 1. Certiorari to superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Abe N. Kumler applied for a writ of certiorari to annul an order of the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county reclassifying that county. A demurrer to the petition was interposed and sustained, and the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Henry W. Nisbet, for appellant. Frank F. Oster and Curtis, Oster & Curtis, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The appellant made application to the court below for a writ of certiorari to annul an order of the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county reclassifying that county, and reading as follows: "Whereas, by reason of the creation and organization of the county of Riverside, the population of the county of San Bernardino has been reduced below the class and rank of a county of the tenth class; and, whereas, the population of said county of San Bernardino is now over twenty-three thousand and under twenty-four thousand,—now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, by the board of supervisors of said county of San Bernardino, that said county of San Bernardino has been reduced to and is a county of the twelfth class, and that the population of said county is now over twenty-three thousand, and under twenty-four thousand." The order was made on January 12, 1894, and it is alleged, upon information and belief, that the population of the territory then within the boundaries of the said county was, in the year 1890, according to the federal census of that year, not greater than 19,000; that the board, in making the order, disregarded and ignored the federal census, and the population shown thereby, and attempted to classify the county on the basis of the population it contained when the order was made; and that in doing so the board exceeded its jurisdiction, and acted without any authority of law. A demurrer to the petition was interposed and sustained, and, the petitioner declining to amend, judgment was entered dismissing the proceeding, from which he appeals.

The constitution (section 5, art. 11) provides: "The legislature by general and uniform laws * * * shall regulate the compensation of all such officers in proportion to their duties, and for this purpose may classify the counties by population. * * *" And the county government act (St. 1893, p. 346) has the following provisions:

"Sec. 10. The several counties of this state are hereby classified, and shall hereafter remain classified, according to their population, as ascertained by the federal census taken in the year eighteen hundred and ninety."

"Sec. 162. For the purpose of regulating the compensation of all officers hereinbefore provided for, the several counties of this state are hereby classified, and shall hereafter remain classified, according to their population, as ascertained by the federal census taken in the year eighteen hundred and ninety as follows. * * *"

"Sec. 235. When the population of any existing county shall have been reduced, by reason of the creation of any new county from the territory thereof, below the class and rank first assumed hereunder, it shall be the duty of the board of supervisors of such county to designate by order the class to which such county has been reduced by reason thereof, and such county shall thereafter enter the list of such class."

1. It is claimed for appellant that the section last quoted, under which the order in question was made, is in conflict with the section of the constitution quoted, because it delegates to the board of supervisors power which, under the constitution, can be exercised only by the legislature. There is nothing in this point. The section does not delegate, or attempt to delegate, to boards of supervisors, the power to classify counties, but simply, in effect, authorizes and directs them to find out and determine how many people are left within the boundaries of the old county after the new county is created. This is merely finding a fact, and is not a legislative act; and, when found, the classification follows as declared by the statute. Nor is the said section of the statute in conflict with section 25 of article 4 of the constitution, which provides that "the legislature shall not pass local or special laws * * * affecting the fees or salary of any officer." It is not a local or special law, for the reason that it applies to every existing county of the state whose class is changed by having a portion of its territory detached and put into a new county.

2. It is further claimed that the board of supervisors, in determining what was the population of the county, was limited to an inquiry as to what was the population within its present boundaries in 1890, as shown by the federal census of that year. It will be observed that sections 10 and 162 make the census of 1890 controlling as to the classification of the several counties of the state as they then existed, but in section 235 no reference is made to that census, and the action of the board is not expressly, nor, as we think, impliedly, limited thereby. The failure to so limit the action of the board must be treated as intentional, and it doubtless arose from the fact that, in the cases provided for by the section, it would often be difficult, if not impossible, to determine what was the census population in 1890, since the new boundary lines may not follow any township or precinct lines then established. See De Camp v. Eveland, 19 Barb. 81. The same section provides for the classification of all newly-created counties, and in Sanders v. Sehorn, 98 Cal. 227, 33 Pac. 58, a question as to the classification of the newly-created county of Glenn was involved. In deciding the case, it was said: "According to the county government act, the population of the various counties, for the purposes of the act, is to be determined from the last preceding federal census; but in the case of newly-organized counties, especially when the boundary lines of the new county do not follow township lines, such census would not furnish the data contemplated, and for that reason the legislature, for the purpose of classification, would well declare the population of Glenn county to be over 6,500, and under 6,600, receiving its information for such declaration from whatever source it saw fit." And, again: "Glenn county came into existence as a county, fully organized and equipped, May 11, 1891. At that time, under the terms of the act creating it, as we have construed that act, it had a population of more than 6,500, and less than 6,600, and, consequently, came within the limits prescribed for counties of the forty-first class." This language plainly implies that the population of the county at the time of its creation, and not its population as ascertained by the federal census, was a proper basis upon which to determine its classification. The same rule must be held equally applicable to an old county under like conditions. It follows that the judgment appealed from must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1894.)

CONTEMPT—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where the statute does not authorize a change of venue for bias, prejudice, or partiality of a judge, it is a contempt of court to present an affidavit for a change of venue on that ground.

In bank.

Petition for habeas corpus by David Jones. Writ denied.

John L. Boone, for petitioner. J. A. Cooper, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The petitioner, David Jones, asks to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff of the county of Mendocino, and alleges that he is illegally imprisoned under an order of the superior court of said county adjudging him guilty of contempt of court. It appears that upon the hearing in said court of a motion made by petitioner, Jones, for the change of the place of trial of a certain civil action, to which said petitioner was a party, the petitioner filed, presented, and read a certain affidavit, and that he was adjudged guilty of contempt for and on account of certain language and statements used and made in said affidavit. It is not necessary to set forth the affidavit here, but it is quite clear that it is of such a character that the act of petitioner in presenting it was disorderly, contemptuous, and insolent behavior towards the judge of said court while holding the same, and, as such, was a contempt of said court. If the matter of the affidavit had been material and relevant and pertinent to any issue before the court, a different question might be presented. If bias, prejudice, or partiality on the part of a judge was a ground for a change of venue, a party seeking such change upon such ground would have the right to state in an affidavit the facts upon which he based his charges of such bias; but the only ground for a change of venue which has any relation to the judge of a court of record is found in subdivision 4, § 397, Code Civ. Proc., which is as follows: "When from any cause the judge is disqualified from acting,"—and the only disqualifications of a judge are those stated in section 170, by which he is disqualified when he is a party to or interested in the action pending, when he is related to either party or his attorney within the third degree, and when he has been an attorney for either party in the action. "These are the only causes which work a disqualification of a judicial officer." McCauley v. Weller, 12 Cal. 524. Bias or prejudice on the part of a judge is not a ground for a change of the place of trial. McCauley v. Weller, supra; People v. Williams, 24 Cal. 31; People v. Mahoney, 18 Cal. 186; People v. Shuler, 28 Cal. 495; Hibberd v. Smith, 39 Cal. 148. The affidavit, therefore, was entirely irrelevant and immaterial, and there is no excuse for or justification of its presentation. The petitioner is remanded to the custody of the said sheriff, and the proceeding is dismissed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1894.)

PROOF OF AGENCY—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

It is not error to admit evidence of what an agent did and said while acting for his principal, before proof of his authority, where it is admitted on condition that his authority will be subsequently proved.

Action by F. E. Bates against Virginia A. Tower and another for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and Virginia A. Tower appeals. Affirmed.

Shaw & Holland, for appellant. Clarence L. Barber, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendants are husband and wife, and this action was brought against them to recover damages for a breach of an alleged written agreement, of which the following is a copy: "This agreement, made and entered into this 27th day of September, 1888, by and between Virginia A. Tower and Frank E. Bates, both of the city and county of San Diego, state of California. Whereas, the said Virginia A. Tower agrees to deliver all the said personal stock and property sold by the said F. E. Bates to F. C. Tower on the 25th day of July, 1888, in consideration of a certain promissory note of $2,500 now in the possession of said F. E. Bates,—the said stock and personal property to be delivered to the said F. E. Bates upon the surrender of the said promissory note,—the said F. E. Bates agrees to deliver to the said Virginia A. Tower a certain promissory note for $2,500, made and executed by F. C. Tower, payable to the order of F. S. Jones, and indorsed by F. S. Jones, the same being in possession of and owned by the said F. E. Bates. Witness our hand this 27th day of September. Virginia A. Tower. F. E. Bates." The court found the execution of the agreement, and a breach thereof by the defendant Virginia A. Tower, substantially as alleged, and gave judgment against her for damages in the sum of $3,100, from which judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, she alone appeals.

The appellant contends that in several specified particulars the findings of fact by the court are not justified by the evidence. But the sufficiency of the evidence in each of the other specified particulars depends upon its sufficiency to justify the finding that, in dealings leading up to the execution of the agreement above set out, Frank C. Tower was authorized to act as the agent of his wife, Virginia; and that this finding is amply justified is so obvious that it would be a waste of space and time to make a detailed statement of the direct and circumstantial evidence tending to prove it.

It is further insisted that the court erred in admitting evidence of what the husband did and said, while ostensibly transacting certain business for appellant, before proof of his authority to transact such business. When objected to on this ground, the court admitted the evidence pro tempore, and upon the express condition that it should not be considered unless the authority of the husband should thereafter be proved; and, as above stated, the husband's authority was afterwards satisfactorily proved. The general rule is that the mere order in which evidence may be introduced is very much in the discretion of the court, and will not be interfered with by the appellate court except in cases of abuse of such discretion. Crosett v. Whelan, 44 Cal. 200; People v. Shainwold, 51 Cal. 468. But appellant contends that subdivision 5 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure is an exception to this general rule, and permits the acts and declarations of agents to be proved only "after proof of agency." Conceding this to be as contended, though I have found no case in which the Code has been so construed, yet it is clear that appellant was not injured by the alleged error. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order and judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

CONRAD et al. v. ARROWHEAD HOT SPRINGS HOTEL CO. et al. (No. 19,376.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1894.)

POLLUTION OF WATER COURSE.

A nonriparian appropriator of the water of a stream has no right of action for the pollution of the water of said stream by a prior riparian owner, who, in the interest of sanitary conditions, discharges sewage into said stream.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by F. W. Conrad and others against the Arrowhead Hot Springs Hotel Company and others to abate a private nuisance, and for a perpetual injunction against its continuance. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

H. C. Rolfe and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellants. Rowell & Rowell, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to abate a private nuisance, and for a perpetual injunction against its continuance. Plaintiffs had judgment granting them a perpetual injunction, and for nominal damages. Defendants moved for a new trial, which was refused. Two separate appeals are taken,—one from the final judgment, and the other from the order denying a new trial. Both appeals are elucidated by the same transcript. There is also a separate appeal in the same case—No. 19,193 (37 Pac. 388)—from an order refusing to dissolve a preliminary injunction issued in the cause, the result of which depends upon the decision of the other appeals, which will be considered together.

Plaintiffs are the owners of certain tracts of nonriparian lands in the county of San Bernardino, forming a part of a larger tract known as the "Orange Grove Tract." Defendant the Arrowhead Hot Springs Hotel Company (a corporation) is, and it and its grantors have been since 1882, the owners in fee of a tract of land situate upon both sides of and including the bed and banks of East Twin creek, an unnavigable stream, which lands the court finds "are, and from time immemorial have been, riparian to said creek and its flow." There are upon the lands of said defendant a large number of springs,—hot, cold, and medicinal,—and also what are designated "mud baths." Defendant has upon said land, and for ten years prior to the commencement of this action had, an hotel thereon, as a resort for invalids, with bath houses, mud baths, etc., all of which are used for the entertainment of guests and treatment of invalids generally, whether suffering from rheumatic troubles, diseases of the blood, or other diseases. During all of said 10 years, defendant has discharged from its kitchen, bath houses, hotel, privies, etc., the drainage and accumulation of filth and refuse matter therein accumulating, by means of sewers, pipes, etc., into certain ravines contiguous thereto, from and through which ravines it flows by natural channels into and down East Twin creek and pollutes the waters thereof so that they are unfit for drinking, or for any domestic purpose. Plaintiffs have a ditch which diverts the water from East Twin creek about one-half mile below where defendant discharges its sewerage into the stream, by which, and a pipe line connected therewith, they conduct the water of said creek to their land for domestic purposes, and for irrigating their land. Plaintiffs aver, and the court finds, that they have been using, and had a right for one year before the commencement of this action to use, the water of the creek for irrigation and domestic purposes upon their land. There is no allegation or finding as to the date of construction of the ditch through which plaintiffs take the water from the creek, or the source or origin or character of their right thereto. The evidence shows that in 1887 John Hancock conveyed the land now owned by plaintiffs to certain grantees, and in his deed of conveyance included "all the right, title, and interest of John Hancock, the party of the first part therein, in and to the waters of East Twin creek and its tributaries, acquired either by appropriation or otherwise, and then owned or held by him as riparian proprietor of the lands aforesaid, or otherwise; also, ditches held by him, or to which he was entitled, and a right of way for said ditches and such pipe line as the grantees desired to construct over a tract of land held by the grantor on East Twin creek as a timber culture claim," reserving to the grantor five inches of water to be taken from the ditch, which it recites was constructed in 1885, and is, say, one mile in length. Plaintiffs have constructed a pipe line from the end of the ditch to their several lots of land for a distance of, say, one-half mile. The ditch through which the water furnished to plaintiffs' land is diverted and conducted thereto taps East Twin creek, so far as can be determined from the record, about one mile above the Orange Grove tract of land. Defendants, in their answer, plead a prescriptive right to the use of East Twin creek as a place of deposit for the refuse from their hotel, baths, etc. There was evidence to show that until a period within four years next before July 19, 1892, the land of plaintiffs was wholly unoccupied and vacant, not settled upon or improved, and that the pipe system had not, at the last-mentioned date, been in use more than two years. The court found against the prescriptive right of the defendants.

Judging from the record, and the conclusion is drawn that the rights of the plaintiffs are those of the ordinary locators who divert water for a useful purpose from a stream in this state. In other words, they are appropriators. The defendants, as riparian proprietors upon the same stream, have a right thereto prior in time, and, as to the acts complained of, are prior in user, to any rights of plaintiffs. As against other riparian owners below them on the same stream, defendants have no right to pollute the water to the material injury of the former. Locators and appropriators of the waters of a stream have no rights antecedent to the date of their location. If others have, prior to their location, decreased the quantity of the water flowing in such stream, or caused a deterioration of its quality, the subsequent locator cannot complain. Familiar examples of the application of this rule, as between appropriators, are of frequent occurrence in the mining regions of this state, where water is diverted from flowing streams, upon which mining has destroyed the purity of the water. In such cases the appropriator takes the water with his eyes open,—takes it as he finds it,—and as to him the like continued deterioration is damnum absque injuria. Drainage and the discharge of the sewerage from the hotel of the defendants is shown by the evidence to have been necessary, in the interest of sanitary conditions, and to have been for 10 years accomplished by the only feasible plan, of discharging into the ravines contiguous to and upon their own premises. This was not, nor was its continuance as against subsequent locators and appropriators of the water of the stream, a wrongful act. "Every person who constructs a drain or cesspool upon his own premises, and uses it for his own purposes, is bound to keep the filth collected there from becoming a nuisance to his neighbors." Wood, Nuis. (3d Ed.) § 114. This doctrine is well settled, and applies as between parties who have equal rights to the enjoyment of their own property, and to be protected from injury arising from the undue use by their neighbors of their property. In the case of appropriators of running water, there is no mutuality of right. Their titles or rights are not coextensive as to time, or equal in rank. The second appropriator simply takes the residuum in quantity, subject to the changed conditions existing by reason of the prior user. If the water of East Twin creek was so contaminated by the acts of defendants as to be detrimental to the public, or to individuals living upon the stream below, a very different question would be presented. But as an individual who should collect the refuse from a slaughter yard, and haul it to his home, would not be heard to complain that the odor constituted a nuisance, so the locators of this ditch, who have diverted the water of the stream to their homes, a mile or more away, cannot be heard to complain that the water continues after their diversion, as it was before, noxious to the senses, and unfit for domestic use.

Two results follow from the position assumed:

1. The finding of the court that "the defendant corporation has not any right, and at the time this action was commenced had not acquired any right, to drain or sewer its said premises by conducting its sewerage matter accumulating on said premises, from any source or cause, into East Twin creek," is contrary to the evidence.

2. The conclusions of law and judgment are unsupported by the findings.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial, and each of them, should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial, and each of them, are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. SHERMAN. (No. 21,097.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1894.)

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE.

Deceased was a large man, and quarrelsome when drinking. Under the influence of liquor, he assaulted defendant with a knife, threatening to "cut him in two." Defendant declined to fight, and begged him to desist. A friend took deceased away about 30 feet, but he broke away, drew a pistol, and pointed it at defendant. Defendant fired several shots. Deceased fired none, but kept advancing towards defendant while he was shooting. Held, that the killing was done in self-defense.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

J. D. Sherman was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

J. A. Cooper and J. G. White, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and J. H. Seawell, for the People.

PER CURIAM. Upon information accusing the defendant of the crime of murder, he was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to the state's prison for the term of six years. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. It was proved, and not disputed, that about 1 o'clock a. m., on June 20, 1893, in Mendocino county, he shot and killed G. W. Parker, but it is claimed for appellant that the killing was done in self-defense, and therefore was justifiable; and so it appears from the evidence without conflict. It appears that six witnesses were present at the time of the killing. Of these two were called by the people, and four by the defendant; and all concur in testifying substantially that, without provocation, the deceased assaulted defendant with a small clasp knife, threatening "to cut him in two;" that defendant tried to pacify him, declined to fight him, and begged him to desist; that Scott Howard (a mutual friend) interfered, took the knife from deceased, and led him to another part of the room, about 30 feet from defendant, and endeavored to pacify him; but soon after he broke away from Howard, drew his pistol, and started towards defendant, pointing his pistol in the same direction. Mr. Howard, the first witness for the prosecution, described this scene as follows: "I took Parker away and went down to the billiard table at the south end of the room. I was watching deceased. Defendant could see myself and deceased. * * * I was standing talking to deceased, trying to get him to go home, and he just jumped up all at once, and jerked out a gun, and ran around the billiard table. The bar of the saloon is near the north end of the saloon. The billiard table is near the south end, some thirty feet from the bar. I was at the end of the billiard table, where I had taken deceased, and was trying to pacify him. He just jumped out as quick as he could. I ran to catch him, and did catch hold of his sleeve, but I slipped, and he got past. I says, 'Look out up there, boys!' Just about that time I jumped back by the billiard table, and the first shot was fired. At that time the deceased was going around the billiard table towards the north end of the room, and towards where the defendant was. I could not tell the distance he was from defendant, but fifteen to twenty feet, or may be thirty feet. Parker had a silver-mounted pistol in his hand. I do not know how many shots were fired. I was facing the bar when the first shot was fired. I jumped through the partition, and ran out of the building. * * * Defendant fired the first shot. * * * He put his arm over Dick Simmons' shoulder, and fired. Sherman was standing by the bar, and near the door, within five feet of the entrance. A screen was in front of the door. The crowd was there by the bar. Simmons was in front of defendant, and between him and Parker. Defendant advanced towards deceased, and fired over Simmons' shoulder." Gus Henry, on the part of the people, after describing the knife scene, said: "Finally Scott Howard took Parker away. * * * Defendant, myself, and Simmons were standing near the bar, and not far from the door. I thought the matter was all over. The defendant was standing by the bar talking. All at once Scott was running; Scott Howard hollered: 'Look out, boys!' Deceased was coming towards the defendant. He said, 'God damn you—' Just got that far when defendant shot. He had his pistol up, and was advancing towards defendant. As he advanced he said, 'God damn you, I'll—' I heard no more, and the shots were fired. After I saw Parker start towards the defendant with his pistol, his hand was moving up and down. I could not tell whether he was trying to work the trigger or not. There were four or five shots fired as fast as the pistol could be fired; looked like a stream of fire. After the first shot, the deceased kept advancing towards the defendant till he got to the beer chest. He kept coming, and the shots kept going. As the deceased advanced towards defendant, defendant could not have shot without putting his hand out towards Simmons. Just as the shooting commenced, Simmons dropped on the floor. Deceased was drinking at the time. He was always wanting to scuffle and monkey around when he was drinking. He slapped a man's face before that evening. He wants to fight when he is drinking. He could walk as straight as anybody although drinking. Deceased was a very strong man; more than an average man for strength. He always prided himself on being the best man in the saloon when drinking." The pistol of deceased was found fully charged, and it was admitted that he did not fire a shot, though some of the witnesses thought he did at the time of the shooting. The testimony for the prosecution of the witness Schoonover, as to an asserted declaration made by defendant previous to the homicide, contradicted, as it was, by two other witnesses, was of too little importance to affect the result above reached. It is not necessary therefore to determine whether the objection to Schoonover's testimony should have been sustained, or whether the offered evidence of defendant's witness Hughes upon the same subject was properly excluded. Judgment and order reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1894.)

RAPE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the evidence is convincing that a rape has been committed, it is proper to refuse to charge that defendant might be convicted of an assault with intent to rape.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Jose Antonio Chavez was convicted of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

Daney & Wright, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape upon Rebecca A. Foss, a widow, aged 57 years. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The court refused to give the jury an instruction, at the request of the defendant, to the effect that under the information charging the crime of rape the defendant might be convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape. The ruling of the court in this regard rested upon its opinion that there was no evidence to support an instruction of that character. This is the only assignment of error demanding any special consideration, and the proper disposition of it depends upon the nature of the evidence placed before the jury at the trial, for while it may be conceded that an assault with intent to commit rape, as well as a simple assault, are included in the offense here charged, still, if there was no evidence tending to reduce the offense from that charged in the information, the court was entirely justified in refusing to give the instruction requested. This principle has been repeatedly recognized and approved by this court in the trial of defendants charged with murder, where instructions have been asked and refused pertaining to the offense of manslaughter. People v. Turley, 50 Cal. 469; People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 183.

Upon an examination of the record we think the court committed no error in refusing the instruction asked. The evidence upon the part of the prosecution is direct, clear, and convincing that the crime of rape was committed. The outrageous and brutal manner in which the defendant's victim was maltreated and assaulted need not be detailed. Upon the part of the defense there is no evidence contradictory to that introduced by the prosecution, save the testimony of certain medical gentlemen who were placed upon the witness stand as experts upon the probability of an actual penetration having occurred. We think the evidence wholly insufficient to create any conflict in this particular. The slightest penetration is sufficient to constitute the offense, and the expert evidence cannot be said to cast a doubt upon the fact of such penetration having occurred. The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—FORM OF JUDGMENT.

A judgment in a criminal case need not run in the name of the people of the state, under Const. art. 6, § 20, which provides that the style of all process shall be "The People of the State of California," and that all prosecutions shall be conducted in their name and by their authority, as "process," as used in that section, does not include such a judgment.

In bank.

Michael Ahern made application for a writ of habeas corpus. Motion denied.

Alfred Clarke, for petitioner.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, in which the petitioner, Michael Ahern, alleges that he is imprisoned by W. E. Hale, in the state prison at San Quentin, "in violation of the constitution and laws of the United States and of this state, in this: that the paper of commitment on which he is held is not due process of law, because it does not run in the name of the people." It does not appear from the allegations of the petition whether W. E. Hale is or is not warden of the state prison, whether the petitioner has or has not been convicted of a felony punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, or whether or not Mr. Hale has a duly-certified copy of a judgment showing such conviction. But, putting the best construction we can on a petition which, for looseness and vagueness, is rather worse than usual in the productions of its class, we assume that the petitioner is in the custody of the warden of the state prison, who detains him under the authority of a duly-certified copy of a judgment convicting him of an offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and that the supposed illegality of his imprisonment arises out of the fact that the warden has no commitment running in the name of the people of the state. The idea of counsel for petitioner seems to be that no one can be lawfully held a prisoner in the state prison without "process," in the sense in which that word is used in section 20 of article 6 of the constitution, which provides that "the style of all process shall be 'The People of the State of California,' and all prosecutions shall be conducted in their name and by their authority." This provision was contained in the old constitution, and has been in force for more than 30 years, but has never been supposed to apply to the warrant by which prisoners are held after conviction. By the old criminal practice act (section 463), it was provided, as it is now provided by the Code (Pen. Code, § 1213), that a certified copy of the judgment, as entered in the minutes, should be the only warrant or authority necessary to justify or require its execution. Under these provisions of the old constitution and the statute,—exactly the same as the existing provisions of the new constitution and the Code,—the question arose in several cases as to the sufficiency of process, in the form which counsel deems so essential; and it was uniformly held to be insufficient, and a certified copy of the judgment declared to be the proper, essential form of warrant. In re Ring, 28 Cal. 248; Ex parte Dobson, 31 Cal. 498; Ex parte Gibson, Id. 620; In re Brown, 32 Cal. 49. It is true the constitutional provision invoked by counsel was not discussed in those decisions, for the reason, probably, that it was not deemed applicable. But, whatever may have been the reason it was not referred to, we cannot suppose that the framers of the new constitution were ignorant of the point decided, or that they intended the provision readopted from the old constitution to have an operation theretofore uniformly denied to it. In short, we consider that the question which counsel raises, besides being trivial and technical to the last degree, has been settled by the decisions of this court, and the universal practice under those decisions for the last 30 years.

MASTER AND SERVANT—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT.

Plaintiffs, by letter, offered their services to defendant for $5,000 a year. Defendant replied that plaintiffs' "names shall appear on the pay roll at the rate of $416.66 per month." Later, defendant's president inquired if the salary was satisfactory, and plaintiffs replied that they did not know whether they were employed by the month or year; that they would accept no employment except by the year, to which defendant's president consented. Held, that the employment was by the year, at $5,000, payable monthly.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by M. A. Luce and another against the San Diego Land & Town Company for a balance due on salary. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Works & Works, for appellant. E. W. Britt, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $4,166.68, alleged to be the balance due on the annual salary of respondents as the attorneys of appellant, from the 1st day of March, 1892, up to and including the last day of February, 1893, with interest thereon. On the 1st day of March, 1889, the law firm of Luce, McDonald & Torrance, which up to that time had been acting as the attorneys of appellant, at a salary of $83.33 per month, wrote a letter to the land and town company, appellant, explaining the condition of the corporation's legal affairs at that time, and asserting that for some time thereafter an extra amount of labor would devolve upon them as attorneys of the company, by reason of important cases then pending. Among other matters this letter contained the following statement: "We have, as before stated, given the matter very careful consideration, and have concluded that, until these important matters in litigation are disposed of, an annual salary of $5,000 is the least sum for which we ought to take upon ourselves the labor and responsibilities incident to continuing our position as general attorneys for the company in this county and state." In due course, the plaintiffs, in reply, received from the president of the defendant a letter containing, among other matters, the following: "In view of the coming litigation, and the trial of the causes which are enumerated by Judge McDonald, I think that their statement that their present compensation is not adequate is correct. * * * I note, however, the suggestion of our attorneys that they shall receive on and after March 1st compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum; the same, I suppose, to be payable monthly, in conformity to the precedent hitherto. I think this is carrying our legal expenses rather beyond the limit which we ought to incur, especially as many of the cases enumerated may never come to trial. This is not a matter, however, in which we can afford to resort to dickering. You may therefore inform Messrs. Luce, McDonald & Torrance that on and after March 1st, until a change shall be made, their names shall appear on the pay roll at the rate of $416.66 per month." Within a few days subsequent to the receipt by plaintiffs of this letter, William G. Dickinson, general manager of the defendant (appellant), held a conversation with plaintiffs, wherein the following occurred, as appears by the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff McDonald: "Col. Dickinson inquired if we had received his letter in regard to our proposition for salary. I informed him that we had. He then inquired if the proposition was satisfactory. Judge Torrance replied that we didn't know exactly whether it was satisfactory or not. Col. Dickinson replied by inquiring wherein it was unsatisfactory. Judge Torrance replied that 'we had made a proposition for a yearly employment, and that the letter which we had received in reply stated that we would be placed on the pay roll at the rate of $416.66 per month,' and that he (Torrance) 'didn't know whether the company meant by that to employ us by the month, or whether it had accepted our proposition for a yearly employment.' Col. Dickinson replied: 'Why, Judge McDonald knows how that is. He has been on the pay roll before, and knows that we always pay by the month. In his case he has been receiving a thousand dollars a year, divided into twelve monthly payments of $83.33 a month.' Judge Torrence replied: 'Well, there might possibly be some contention with regard to the terms of the employment, and we would under no circumstances accept an employment other than by the year.' Col. Dickinson replied: 'We would no more employ you by the month than you would be employed by it; for we are no more anxious to have you leave us in the lurch at some time in the future, or jump your salary on us,—raise it again,—than you are willing that we should have the right of discharging you at any day that we saw fit.' Judge Torrance said: 'Well, we are perfectly willing, as stated in our letter, to be employed by the year at five thousand dollars per annum. But,' he said, 'I think the proper construction of the two letters means a yearly employment, and nothing else, but I didn't want to leave it in any doubt. I want it distinctly understood that the employment is by the year.' Col. Dickinson replied: 'If it is a monthly payment that you object to, we will pay you by the year, if you want to be paid that way instead of by the month. But,' he said, 'we have always been paying by the month, and I supposed that would be more agreeable to you.' Both Judge Torrance and myself stated that it would be more agreeable to us to be paid in monthly installments than any other way. Col. Dickinson then made some reference to the business of the National City and Otay Railway Company. We told him that that was perfectly satisfactory; that we would attend to the business of the National City and Otay Railway Company, and all other matters or interests in which the land and town company was interested, for the salary of five thousand dollars a year. He said it was all right." The case was tried by the court, without a jury, and the only contention at the trial was as to whether plaintiffs' employment by the defendant was by the year, at an annual salary of $5,000, payable in monthly installments of $416.66; and the findings were in favor of such contention. This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial, and it is now insisted that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings of fact made by the court.

There is no substantial conflict in the evidence, and we have quoted the important and controlling portions of it. Viewing this evidence from any standpoint, we think the case before us a very simple one. Plaintiffs, by letter, offered their services to defendant at an annual salary of $5,000. If defendant's letter be construed as constituting an acceptance of their offer, then plaintiffs' cause of action is complete, and the judgment is right. If defendant's letter does not constitute an acceptance of plaintiffs' offer, then the two letters, taken together, do not constitute a binding contract, and no recovery to any extent could be based thereon. It cannot be successfully urged that defendant's letter was an offer to hire plaintiffs by the month, and that plaintiffs accepted such offer and rendered services thereunder; for they at all times asserted to Dickinson, the general manager of defendant, that they would not enter into a contract of that character. Again, if the letters did not constitute a contract of hiring by the year, they constituted no contract at all, for certainly the minds of the contracting parties never met upon any other terms and conditions. If these letters constituted no contract, then a contract for employment by the year was entered into with plaintiffs by the general manager of the defendant corporation. That the general manager of a corporation doing business in California (its president and directors living in a distant state) had the right to make the contract here sued upon is too clear to demand the citation of authority. It is thus apparent from any aspect of the case that plaintiffs are entitled to recover. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

In re BLYTHE'S ESTATE.

WELSH et al. v. PENNIE. (No. 15,284.)

APPEAL—PARTIES IN INTEREST.

Where, on the death of an administrator, his successor sues his executor for an accounting, and such successor is directed to pay the executor money, to be paid an attorney for services, this does not make the attorney a party to the suit so as to authorize him to prosecute, in his own name, an appeal from an order refusing to allow interest on such sum.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Application by Elizabeth G. Welsh, executrix of the will of Philip A. Roach, and John A. Wright, for an order requiring James C. Pennie, administrator of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, to pay a sum of money allowed on accounting in equity. Order made that amount be paid without interest, and Elizabeth G. Welsh and John A. Wright appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Herrin, Smith, Wright & Pomeroy, and John A. Wright (Isaac Frohman, of counsel), for appellants. Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Philip A. Roach, deceased, died while administrator of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe; and James C. Pennie succeeded him as such administrator. Afterwards, Pennie brought a suit in equity in the superior court, against the executor of said Philip A. Roach, for an accounting of the acts and doings of said Roach as such administrator; and on January 15, 1891, a judgment was rendered in said suit, in which it was adjudged, among other things, that the estate of Roach be allowed the sum of $95,000 as a counsel fee for the services of John A. Wright rendered to said Roach as such administrator, and that Pennie pay the same, out of the moneys of the estate of said Blythe, to the executor of said Philip A. Roach. This judgment was affirmed on appeal to this court. Pennie v. Roach, 94 Cal. 515, 29 Pac. 956, 30 Pac. 106. Afterwards, Elizabeth G. Welsh (present executrix of the will of said Phillip A. Roach) and said John A. Wright made a motion in the probate court for an order that Pennie, administrator of the estate of said Blythe, deceased, pay to the said executrix, for the use and benefit of said Wright, the said sum of $95,000, with interest thereon from the 15th day of January, 1891, at 7 per cent. per annum. On the hearing of the motion, it appeared that Pennie had already paid $5,000 of said amount; and the probate court on August 5, 1892, made an order that Pennie pay to Wright $90,000, without interest, in full satisfaction of the services of said Wright. The executrix, Welsh, and said Wright, appeal from so much of said order as refuses to allow interest.

It is not necessary to determine whether or not the order appealed from, or any part thereof, is appealable. The appeal of the executrix certainly need not be considered; for she is not, in any sense, an aggrieved party. So far as Wright is concerned, assuming that the order sought to be appealed from is appealable, we see no error committed by the probate court. As Roach, the former administrator of Blythe, had died, his successor as such administrator, Pennie, was compelled, under well-settled practice, to go into a court of equity for an accounting; and, in the suit which he brought there against the executor of Roach, he and the said executor were the only parties. That part of the judgment in that case which allowed said executor, in his settlement, the amount of said attorney's fee for the services of Wright, was in favor of said executor. There was no judgment in that case in favor of Wright, who was not a party to the action; therefore, when the said order of the probate court was made, from which this appeal is taken, the said Wright had no judgment or claim which bore interest. The order appealed from is affirmed.

MERRILL v. MERRILL. (No. 19,223.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1894.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by Mattie H. Merrill against F. H. Merrill to recover money paid under contract for the purchase of land, in which there was a judgment for plaintiff. From a refusal of the court to allow her a lien on the land, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Pope, for appellant. R. Duningan, J. M. Voss, and W. H. Henning, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon further consideration of this cause, after submission in bank, we are satisfied with the conclusion which was reached by department 2, in its opinion filed January 26, 1894 (35 Pac. 768); and, for the reasons stated in said opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SHEEHY v. SHINN. (No. 15,237.)

SALES ON MARGINS—GAMBLING CONTRACTS.

1. Const. art. 4, § 26, provides that all contracts for the sale of corporate shares on margin, or for future delivery, shall be void, and any money paid on such contracts may be recovered by the party paying it. Held, that whenever the purchaser of stock paid the vendor, or his broker, a percentage of the price upon an agreement that the stock should be held as security for the balance, the amount so paid was "margin."

2. An agreement between vendor and vendee for the sale of stock upon payment of a part of the agreed price—the stock to be retained by the vendor as security for the balance, and only to be delivered upon full payment, with the right in the vendor to sell it at any time, without notice to the vendee, if it should so depreciate in the market as to be worth less than three times the unpaid balance—is a sale of stock on margin, and for future delivery.

3. An agreement that defendant should act as agent for plaintiff in buying stock for her from third parties, and pay the whole price thereof, two-thirds of which is advanced by plaintiff,—the stock to be held by defendant until the balance is paid, and as collateral security for the balance due on other stock, the title to remain in defendant while so held by him,—is a sale on margin of such stock by the defendant to plaintiff.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Anne M. Sheehy against Howard H. Shinn to recover money paid defendant upon contracts for the sale of stocks on margin. Judgment for plaintiff for part of her claim. Both parties appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Herrin and Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for plaintiff. John P. O'Brien, for defendant.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action founded upon the following clause of section 26 of article 4 of the constitution of 1879: "All contracts for the sale of shares of the capital stock of any corporation or association, on margin, or to be delivered at a future day, shall be void, and any money paid on such contracts may be recovered by the party paying it by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction." The plaintiff sues to recover money alleged to have been paid to defendant upon contracts for the sale of stocks "on margin." The cause was tried in the superior court without a jury, and, on the facts found, judgment was given for the plaintiff for $648 and costs. From this judgment both parties appeal, the plaintiff contending that on the findings the judgment in her favor should have been for about $1,200, and the defendant insisting that the decision of the superior court is contrary to the evidence set out in his bill of exceptions, and also that the specific findings of fact are inconsistent with the general finding to the effect that the transactions between him and the plaintiff "were sales of stock of incorporated companies on margin, or to be delivered at a future day," upon which finding the judgment against him is based.

We are of the opinion that our decision in both appeals must depend wholly upon the proper construction of the findings of the superior court and of the constitutional provision above quoted. The evidence contained in the defendant's bill of exception relates exclusively to the meaning of the terms "on margin," "future delivery," etc., according to the usage of brokers and other dealers in stocks at San Francisco during the years immediately preceding the adoption of the new constitution; and, although it has been carefully read and considered, it can only be regarded as one among various sources of information to which the court may resort for the purpose of ascertaining a fact of purely judicial cognizance. Whatever may have been the evidence in the superior court, and whatever effect it may have been allowed, this court must now decide, as matter of law, what the framers of the constitution intended by the terms they have employed; and this construction does not depend upon the evidence of the witnesses in a particular case, for if it did we should be compelled to affirm one construction in one case, and a different construction in another case,—an absurdity which can only be avoided by giving effect to the rule that courts take judicial notice of the true meaning of all legal expressions (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875), and this, of course, includes all the terms used in the constitution or in acts of the legislature.

Looking, therefore, to the evidence in this case only so far as we may find that it affords us some aid in arriving at the actual intention of the framers of the constitution, we proceed to inquire what that intention was. For this purpose the language of the constitution is necessarily the first thing to be considered, and if its meaning is plain there is no occasion to resort to extraneous aids. With respect to the clause under consideration, it does not seem to be very obscure in its terms or intent. It declares that certain contracts shall be void, and that any money paid in pursuance of them may be recovered back by the party paying it, in any court of competent jurisdiction. The provision is evidently self-executing, needing no act of the legislature to give it its intended effect. Contracts of the class designated are rendered void by the constitution itself, and money paid in pursuance of them is recoverable by actions commenced in the superior or justice's courts, according as the amount claimed is greater or less than $300. The only question of construction which can possibly arise is upon the meaning of the phrase, "on margin or to be delivered at a future day," but even as to this there is little difficulty, so far as the present case is concerned. There are some transactions which are clearly and plainly within the designated class, although there are others with respect to which it may be doubtful whether they are included or not. The meaning of the word "margin," as ordinarily used in connection with stock sales, has long been well understood. As most frequently employed in this state at the time of, and for many years prior to, the adoption of the constitution, it meant the sum deposited by a purchaser of stock with his broker, being a certain percentage of the purchase price of the stock, the broker agreeing to advance the balance of the purchase price upon condition that he should hold the stock as security for his advances, with the right to sell it in case of depreciation in value, and failure of the purchaser to keep the margin good. This, we say, was the sense in which the word was most frequently employed, but it was also employed to describe deposits made by sellers and purchasers of stock for future delivery upon a variety of conditions, and in various ways, which need not be considered here. It is enough for all the purposes of this case to say that whenever the purchaser of stock paid to the vendor of the stock, or to his broker, a percentage of the purchase price upon an agreement that the stock should be held as security for the balance, the amount so paid was "margin," in the sense in which the term was used by the framers of the new constitution. If the mere language of the instrument did not make this sufficiently manifest, it is made so by reference to the arguments of both the advocates and opponents of the provision in the constitutional convention (2 Debates, pp. 806–810), and by the evidence in this record. This being so, it follows that an agreement between vendor and vendee for the sale of stock upon payment of a part of the agreed price—the stock to be retained by the vendor as security for the balance, and only to be delivered upon full payment, with the right in the vendor to sell it at any time, without notice to the vendee, if it should so depreciate in the market as to be worth less than three times the unpaid balance—is a sale of stock on margin, and for future delivery. That such was the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant in this case, and that he (the defendant), though nominally a mere broker for the plaintiff, was in reality her vendor, is, in effect, the finding of the superior court, as a conclusion, not of law, but of fact, and upon this fact the judgment is based. Unless, therefore, the more specific findings of fact are inconsistent with this general finding, the right of the plaintiff to recover the amount paid by her upon such margin sales cannot be denied. To determine whether there is any such inconsistency, it will be convenient to quote the more material portions of the findings in full. They are as follows:

"Between the 1st day of April, 1890, and the 1st day of July, 1891, the defendant was a stockbroker, engaged in business as such, in the purchase and sale for customers at the city and county of San Francisco of the stocks of incorporated companies. That on the 10th day of April, 1890, the plaintiff opened an account with the defendant, as such broker, and from that time onward until about July 1, 1891, continued said account with him, and to transact business with him, as such broker; having him purchase and sell, for her account with him, stocks of incorporated companies, as such broker. That on each occasion that the plaintiff ordered defendant to buy or sell any of such stock, as aforesaid, she made, signed, and delivered to him a written order therefor in the following form:

" 'Howard H. Shinn, member S. F. Stock Exchange Board, stockbroker, No. 318 Pine street, will buy and sell stocks for cash, with the express understanding that all stocks purchased, or which are held by him as collateral, may be sold by him, in his discretion, at any time, without any demand upon the customer for the payment of the balance of account then due, or without any demand whatever, or without any notice of the time or place of said sale, and without any notice whatever at the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board, at any regular or informal session thereof, or at private sale, whenever the lowest market value of such stock or stocks is less than thrice the amount of such balance of account due him by the customer, or whenever, in his judgment, the stock is liable to depreciate so as to make the security insufficient; and if such sale or sales do not cover such balance of account then the undersigned will pay the remainder, with interest, and any taxes levied on such indebtedness, or on the securities held as collateral, shall be charged to the account, and become a part thereof. Rates of interest to be 1½ per cent. per month, compounding monthly. When stocks are borrowed or sold on account of the undersigned, H. H. Shinn has the right to buy such stocks without any demand upon, and without any notice to, the customer, on street, or in said San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board, at any regular or informal session thereof, whenever he thinks he has not sufficient money or security on hand to protect himself against loss. H. H. Shinn shall not be required to keep on hand the identical certificates of stock purchased or pledged, but it shall be sufficient if they have the same number of shares of stock to deliver when properly deliverable and properly called for. All customers' stock on hand shall be held as collateral for customers' entire account. If at any time the funds in the hands of H. H. Shinn, belonging to the customer, are insufficient to pay the purchase price of any stock purchased for him, then H. H. Shinn, if he sees fit to do so, may advance the deficiency, and the money so advanced shall immediately become due and payable from the customer to him; and if not immediately paid, without demand, he shall have the right, at any time after such advance, to sell any or all stocks in his hands, without notice or demand upon said customer, to repay such balance, such sale to be made in the manner hereinabove provided. All stocks purchased or held under this agreement may be placed absolutely in the name of any person selected by H. H. Shinn. This agreement shall not be varied by any oral agreement, but can only be varied by a written agreement indorsed hereon, and subscribed by the parties hereto. Stocks bought and delivered, as received, to customers, at their risk, unless transferred at office. H. H. Shinn is hereby constituted and appointed my attorney in fact, to purchase or sell stocks for my account in accordance with the foregoing conditions, and his signature to this order, as a contract between us, is hereby expressly waived. For value received, I hereby agree that the foregoing terms and conditions do and shall apply to and govern all future transactions and accounts with the undersigned, unless varied by a subsequent written agreement.

" 'San Francisco, ———, 1890. Please ———, for my account and risk, subject to the above terms, and also subject to the rules of the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board: ———. This order good for street, or any session, until ———. (Unless time is expressed, orders good until countermanded.)'

"The foregoing is one of the orders given, all of which were in the same form, with the insertion in the particular order of the word 'buy' or the word 'sell,' as the case required, and the particular stock and number of shares intended to be bought or sold. Each order was signed by the plaintiff, and delivered to and accepted by the defendant.

"The course of dealing and the proceedings upon such orders and said account were as follows: Upon receipt of the order the defendant, in all cases, went into the next meeting of the stock board, and bought or sold the stock requested for the account of the plaintiff. The stock so purchased was always actually delivered by the seller to the defendant, for the plaintiff's account, on the day following the purchase, and upon such delivery the whole purchase price was paid by the defendant to the seller. In some instances the plaintiff furnished to the defendant the whole purchase price of the stock ordered to be purchased. In such cases the stock was actually, at once, delivered to her, or she was notified by defendant that it was at her disposal when she chose to call for it, whereupon she sometimes called for such stock at once, and sometimes left it for a few days in the hands of the broker, and then took it away. But in some of the instances, though the particular stock was paid for, the defendant claimed and asserted a right to hold it, under his contract, as security for the general balance due upon plaintiff's general account with defendant, as such broker, which account existed at all of the times aforesaid, and as hereinafter shown. In the general account which defendant, as such broker, opened with plaintiff, and conducted through the aforesaid period, there were in general daily transactions of purchases and sales, and often many of such transactions on the same day, either purchases or sales, or both, for said account, throughout said period during which said account was continued as aforesaid; and the defendant, in order to keep plaintiff advised of the state of said account, furnished her a pass book, in which he entered the particulars, showing the different transactions in said account as they occurred; namely, on the debit pages of said pass book was entered by defendant the date of each purchase, with the kind and number of shares purchased, and the price paid for the stock; also, the commissions charged by defendant for executing the order; also, any moneys which defendant paid to plaintiff directly out of said account, and the date of its payment; also, monthly, at the end of each month, the amount of interest charged by defendant on any balance of said account in his favor during that particular month. And on the credit pages of said pass book were entered the date of each sale of stock, with the number of shares and kind of stock sold, the price obtained therefor, and the commissions charged by defendant for executing the order; also, the different amounts of money which plaintiff paid to defendant to be applied, and which defendant received from plaintiff directly, and applied on said account, with the date of its payment. When, during said account, plaintiff executed to defendant an order as aforesaid to buy a particular lot of said stock for her said account, he bought the stock so ordered on the day of the date of the order, and on the following day the stock was delivered to him by the seller; and thereupon defendant furnished and paid to the seller the price of the stock so bought, and thereupon the defendant received from the seller the said stock, and held the same under the provisions of the agreement above set forth, and defendant charged to plaintiff's said account in said pass book the amount advanced on her account to make said purchase, and also the commissions charged by him for executing the order. In the cases where the order was to sell, the defendant, on the day of the date of the order, sold the stock so ordered sold, and the following day he furnished and delivered it to the purchaser, and received from the purchaser the price obtained; and defendant thereupon entered to plaintiff's credit, in said account in said pass book, the amount so received by him, less his commissions for executing the order. From time to time, during said account, defendant paid to plaintiff, out of said account, sums of money, and upon making any such payment he made entry in said pass book, on the debit side, of the amount so paid, with the date of its payment. From time to time, during the continuance of said account, defendant made calls upon plaintiff, requiring her to pay him money or further security on said account to keep the balance of said account due him within the limits as agreed in said orders,—namely, so that the market value of the stocks and security in his hands on said account should be equal to thrice the amount of such balance due him on the said account,—and plaintiff, at various times, and for that purpose, paid to defendant, on said account, sums of money, and upon any such payment being made the defendant entered the amount and date thereof to plaintiff's credit in said account, on the credit side of said pass book. The aggregate monthly purchases of stocks on said account with the expenditures made by defendant therefor, also, the aggregate monthly sales and receipts therefor in said account, are given below; and also, below, are set out the items, with amounts and dates, of money either paid by defendant to plaintiff out of said account, or paid by plaintiff to defendant on said account, as above stated. It was always understood that the plaintiff could at any time have possession of the stock purchased as aforesaid, upon payment to the defendant of the full sum due on her account, as above stated; but, on the other hand, it was always understood that the stock should be held by defendant as security, as above stated, until all of plaintiff's obligations on the account should be paid to defendant, or the stock should be disposed of to satisfy the same, and in all these cases the plaintiff never saw the stock. In all cases, at the time when the orders were given, and the advances and purchases made, the plaintiff intended to buy and sell, as the case might be, the stock she ordered to be bought or sold, and intended that the defendant should actually purchase or sell it, and should hold it, when bought, subject to her orders, but subject also to his rights of security upon it for his advances, interest, and commissions, and all plaintiff's obligations to him, and the defendant had the same intention; and it was understood that plaintiff could buy or sell what stocks she pleased on said account, so long as she kept the security sufficient in defendant's hands. In many of the cases the plaintiff ordered the defendant to sell stock held by him for her as aforesaid in the course of said account, and in such cases the defendant went into the market, and sold the stock in pursuance of the order, receiving and crediting the plaintiff's account with the proceeds. In some cases, for purposes of convenience, the defendant substituted one certificate of stock for another of an equal number of shares of the same kind of stock, but always kept on hand, for the account of the plaintiff, the requisite number of shares of the particular stock. Such substitutions were in accordance with the agreement of the parties and the usages of the business."

The succeeding findings set forth in detail payments by and to plaintiff, the purchases and sales of stock, the prices paid and realized, the commissions and interest charged, etc., from which it appears that the plaintiff paid in during a period of 14 months the sum of $3,034.35, and drew out $1,441.00, leaving a balance in her favor of $1,593.35; that the defendant bought 787 shares and sold 7,530 shares, which, presumably, were the shares fully paid for and delivered to plaintiff. Then comes the general finding to which reference has been made, as follows: "But the court find that the transactions between plaintiff and defendant, as shown on said account, in that a part only of the purchase price was advanced by defendant, and the stock retained by him as aforesaid, were sales of stock of incorporated companies on margin, to be delivered at a future day." Here, as above stated, the court finds as a fact that the transactions between the plaintiff and defendant were, in substance and effect, a sale of stocks on margin, and for future delivery; and the question is whether this conclusion is invalidated by the more specific findings which precede it. We do not find any inconsistency. It is not to be denied that the defendant did all that was possible to give to the transactions between him and the plaintiff the form and color of dealings between her and third parties, in which he was a mere agent; but it is equally true that the court might properly find, from the terms of their contracts and their course of dealing, that the form under which they sought to conduct the business was one thing, and its substance a different thing.

Counsel for defendant, in their argument, lay great stress upon the provision of the contract that "all customers' stock on hand shall be held as collateral for customers' entire account," and upon the findings that, on every order of plaintiff, defendant actually went into the next meeting of the stock board, and bought the stock for plaintiff's account, paid for it in full, and had it actually delivered by the seller for plaintiff's account, and held it under the provisions of the agreement above set forth; that "in all cases, at the time when the orders were given and the advances and purchases made, the plaintiff intended to buy or sell, as the case might be, the stock she ordered to be bought or sold, and intended that the defendant should actually purchase or sell it, and should hold it, when bought, subject to her orders, but subject also to his rights of security upon it for his advances, interest, and commissions, and all plaintiff's obligations to him, and the defendant had the same intention. In some cases, for purposes of convenience, the defendant substituted one certificate of stock for another, of an equal number of shares of the same kind of stock, but always kept on hand, for the account of plaintiff, the requisite number of shares of the particular stock. Such substitutions were in accordance with the agreement of the parties." But none of these things are inconsistent with the conclusion that the real transactions between the plaintiff and defendant were sales on margin by him to her, except in those instances where she paid in full, and received the stock. The fact that by the contract it was stipulated that all customers' stock should be held as collateral, etc., amounts to nothing, when you can see from other portions of the contract that the customer would never in fact become the owner of any stock not fully paid for. Nor is it anything to the purpose that defendant actually bought the stock ordered, paid for it, and received it for the account of the plaintiff. It is quite consistent with a sale by him to her that he should do all these things. By buying the stock he would protect himself from loss in case of a rise, and the margin of 66⅔ per cent., which, by the terms of the contract, she was obliged to keep good (though the word "margin" is not used), would protect him from loss in case of a fall. The purchase and delivery of the stock for her account would be a mere formality, meaningless and delusive, in view of the provisions of the contract which left him the practical owner of it, and deprived her, not only of all the rights ordinarily pertaining to ownership, but of all the ordinary rights of a pledgor. By the express terms of the contract, she was never to acquire the title to any specific shares until they were fully paid for and delivered. As to all other shares, she was merely to have a credit on account for a certain number; the title and possession of the certificates remaining in the defendant, with absolute right of disposition whenever the margin was not kept good.

Nor is it inconsistent with a sale from defendant to plaintiff that she intended to buy the stock which she ordered, and that he should buy it and hold it subject to her orders and his own rights under the contract, and that he had the same intention, and that he always kept on hand the requisite number of shares. She, of course, intended to buy the stock on margin, subject to all the contingencies provided for in their agreement, and he intended that she should have it subject to the stipulated conditions; but, until those conditions were performed, he was substantially the owner of the stock and the certificates. She was not the owner, and was never to become the owner unless she paid for them. Counsel, of course, would not contend that a contract for the sale of stocks on margin and for future delivery would be placed beyond the reach of the constitutional provision by the mere fact that the seller under such a contract purchases the stock from a third party, and holds it pending the time given to complete the purchase; but they are contending that the court should shut its eyes to all the indicia of the real nature of these transactions, and treat them as if they were in fact what the parties have chosen to call them. But this we cannot do. The provision of the constitution was aimed at the substance of these abuses, and not at the form. Its framers meant to put an end to the stock gambling then prevalent, and for this purpose declared void all margin sales, or sales for future delivery. To hold that a broker may make and enforce such sales, and retain the payments made under such contracts, by the simple device of going through the form of buying from a third party for the account of the purchaser, when by his contract he has made elaborate provision that the title to the shares shall remain in himself, and never pass to the purchaser until full payment is made, would render the provision in question utterly nugatory. To give effect to the constitution, it is as much the duty of the courts to see that it is not evaded as that it is not directly violated. This is the principle of the decision in Cashman v. Root, 89 Cal. 373, 26 Pac. 883,—a case which cannot be distinguished from this in any essential particular. Counsel attempt to establish a distinction by pointing to the fact that in that case the defendant expressly admitted that the object of the transaction there in question was a course of dealing in stocks on margin. But what was there admitted in terms is here amply established in substance, the name only being suppressed. It would, indeed, have been sufficient to have affirmed this judgment on the authority of that decision; but the importance of the subject, and the numerous cases which have arisen, or may arise, out of similar dealings, has induced us to reconsider the whole question, and the arguments advanced by counsel, not only in this case, but in a number of other cases pending here, which involve a similar state of facts. After such reconsideration, we are entirely satisfied that the decision in Cashman v. Root was right, and that it must stand. We are, at the same time, convinced that it involves none of the mischiefs which counsel insist will flow from it. It will not prevent any legitimate transfer of stock, whether through the agency of a broker or otherwise, nor will it prevent any legitimate and bona fide pledge of stock certificates as security for borrowed money, whether borrowed for the purpose of paying for the stock, or any other purpose. Where such is not only the form, but the substance, of the transaction, the inhibition of the constitution does not apply.

With respect to the defendant's appeal, to which we have thus far confined our attention, our conclusion is that the judgment must be affirmed. The plaintiff's appeal demands but little attention. She contends that on the findings she is entitled, as a simple matter of bookkeeping, to a judgment for the difference between what she paid defendant and what she received from him, and her counsel states the balance at $1,243.75. As a simple matter of bookkeeping, the balance seems to us to be $1,593.35, but the right of plaintiff to demand that amount is not so clear. The findings show that defendant purchased 340 shares more than he sold, and also that, for some shares, plaintiff made full payment, and received the certificates. It is entirely consistent with the findings to assume that the price of these full-paid shares makes up the difference between the balance claimed and the amount allowed by the superior court, viz. $602. If it be contended that we have no right to assume this, as against the defendant, it may be replied that we have no right to assume anything else against the plaintiff. The judgment is in her favor, and the findings must support it. Really, they do not show conclusively that she was entitled to recover as much as $602, and it is only by the presumptions in its favor that it can be sustained at all. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment, and in the opinion of Chief Justice BEATTY. I see no other possible construction of the constitutional provision in question. It is proper to remark, however, that the judiciary cannot avoid the consequences of a provision of constitutional law which allows a party to a contract to profit by it as long as it pays, and to repudiate it by boldly ignoring his solemn obligations as soon as it begins to show loss.

GREENZWEIG v. STRELINGER. (No. 15,168.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1894.)

Action on Foreign Judgment — Impeachment—Failure to Serve Writ.

1. In an action on a judgment rendered in another state, such judgment may be impeached by showing by extrinsic evidence that no summons had been served therein.

2. In such case it cannot be shown that the summons was not read to defendant when it is not shown that the reading was necessary to effect a service.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by George Greenzweig against Marie A. Strelinger on a judgment rendered in another state. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. H. Lowenthal, for appellant. Wm. Rigby, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover $706.35 and interest alleged to be due upon a judgment recovered against defendant in one of the courts of general jurisdiction of the state of Illinois. The complaint is unverified, and the answer contains a general denial. The plaintiff obtained judgment in the superior court, from which and an order denying her motion for a new trial defendant appeals. The record shows that the defendant was sworn as a witness in her own behalf upon the trial, and was asked whether any summons was served upon her in the action in which the judgment sued upon was rendered. The court sustained an objection to this question, upon the ground "that the judgment on which this suit was brought could not be attacked collaterally; that it could only be attacked in a supplemental proceeding in the suit itself in the court in which it was rendered, or by suit in equity directly aimed to set aside the judgment; that all evidence of defendant tending to show the want of service of such process or summons, or to contradict the return of the sheriff of Cook county, Ill., as to such service, was inadmissible, and should be excluded on that ground." This ruling was erroneous. In Re James' Estate, 33 Pac. 1122, we said that it was competent to collaterally impeach a judgment rendered in another state by extrinsic evidence showing want of jurisdiction in the court pronouncing the judgment, and this, too, notwithstanding the record of the judgment sought to be impeached might contain a recital of the existence of such jurisdictional facts. See, also, as sustaining this rule the following cases, which were cited in that opinion. Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457; Machine Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 11 Sup. Ct. 92; Starbuck v. Murray, 5 Wend. 148; Eager v. Stover, 59 Mo. 87.

There was no error in sustaining the objection to the other question in relation to the omission of the sheriff to read to the witness the writ of attachment and summons issued in the action resulting in the judgment sued upon. There is nothing in this record to show that it was necessary to read those papers to the witness in order to effect their service. Judgment and order reversed.

MOWRY v. MOWRY et al. (No. 15,119.)

Power of Attorney—Validity of Execution.

In an action to quiet title and for a writ of possession, it appeared that S., in 1873, gave O. a power of attorney to convey lands; that O., in 1877, as attorney, made a deed of the land to his own son, who paid no consideration therefor; that, when this deed was made, O. held notes of S. for $4,500, which were marked "Paid" the day the deed was dated; that, shortly afterwards, S. asked the son if he had received the deed; that, about the date of the deed, S. admitted his indebtedness to O., and said he would convey the property in payment. Held that, as there was evidence from which a jury might find a sale for a valuable consideration, the transaction was within the power, the only objection being that the agent who made the purchase and paid the consideration executed the deed, but that this was ratified by the principal by personal delivery of the deed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Joseph C. Mowry against George B. Mowry and others to quiet title, and for a writ of possession. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Percy R. Wright, for appellants. Frank Otis, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendants are in possession of a certain lot in San Francisco, and the plaintiff brought this action to quiet his title thereto, and for a writ of possession. Both parties claim under Sylvester Mowry, deceased,—the plaintiff under a deed executed by Sylvester by his attorney in fact, Origin Mowry, and the defendants George B. and Ellen M. Mowry as the only children and heirs at law of Sylvester, of whose estate George B. is administrator. The other defendants are tenants under the administrator. Origin and Sylvester Mowry were brothers, and Origin is also dead. The power of attorney under which Origin executed the deed was made in 1873, and the conveyance thereunder to the plaintiff was dated July 21, 1877, and is claimed to have been delivered in August of that year. Several questions of fact were litigated, the principal of which were the mental capacity of Sylvester, the delivery of the deed, and whether there was any consideration therefor. The case was tried before a jury, and resulted in a general verdict for the plaintiff, and this appeal is from the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial. The only exceptions to the sufficiency of the evidence relate to the conveyance to plaintiff, and not to the mental capacity of Sylvester Mowry.

It is contended by appellants that plaintiff gave no consideration for the conveyance, and that there was no sale to him. The facts shown by the evidence touching this transaction were that Sylvester owned the lot here in question, and also a 40-acre tract near Niles, in Alameda county. The plaintiff, at the time of the conveyance, was about 19 years of age, recently out of school, and was then working on his father's place. As between plaintiff, the grantee in the deed, and Sylvester Mowry, the grantor, it is clear there was no consideration, nor was there any agreement of sale between them; and, as between the plaintiff and his father, who was the attorney in fact of Sylvester, it was a gift. It is not contended by respondent that an attorney in fact can, unless expressly empowered so to do, make a gift of his principal's property. The power here was to sell and convey. It is contended, however, that a consideration was paid by Origin to Sylvester, and that such consideration is sufficient to support the conveyance to the son. If there was a sale by Sylvester to Origin, it is insisted by appellant that Origin's relation of the transaction was such that he could not make a conveyance to himself; and as the son paid no consideration, and was in no way connected with the alleged sale, which, if made at all, was made to Origin, that Origin could not make a valid conveyance. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the power of attorney and the deed to the plaintiff, the latter being a grant, bargain, and sale deed, reciting a consideration. This made a prima facie case, and is sufficient to support the verdict, in the absence of evidence sufficient to overcome it. For the purpose of sustaining the deed against the attack of defendants, evidence was introduced tending to show that Origin held two promissory notes made by Sylvester,—one for $500, and the other for $4,000,—and that Sylvester was indebted to Origin for other moneys; and these notes were produced upon the trial, bearing an indorsement, "Paid, July 21, 1877," that being the date of the deed; that Sylvester, at or about the time of the transaction, admitted his said indebtedness, and said he had or would convey the property to Origin in payment of his debt; and, as to the delivery of the deeds, the evidence tends to show that, after the deeds were signed and acknowledged, they came to the hands of Sylvester, who examined them, and himself delivered the deed of the 40 acres to plaintiff's brother, and left the deed for plaintiff, who was absent, with Origin, to be delivered, and a few days thereafter asked plaintiff if he had received his deed. While the course here pursued is not to be commended, we think the evidence sufficient to justify the jury in finding that there was a sale by Sylvester for a good consideration, and that the deed was in fact delivered by Sylvester to the plaintiff. The case of Videau v. Griffin, 21 Cal. 390, cited by appellant, is not in point. There, there was no authority in writing given to the person who executed the deed as attorney in fact. The acknowledgment by the grantor did not cure the defect. If, in this case, there was no sale by Sylvester, the transaction was outside and beyond the power, and in such case Videau v. Griffin would apply; but, as there was evidence from which the jury might find a sale for a valuable consideration, the transaction was within the power, the only objection being that the agent who made the purchase and paid the consideration himself executed the deed; but this, we think, was ratified by the principal by his personal delivery of it. The court did not err in receiving said promissory notes in evidence. It is true the indorsements thereon that they were paid did not of themselves show that they were in any way connected with the conveyance of the land, but the plaintiff testified that Sylvester told him that he owed Origin "some money on notes, and that these deeds were in payment." This evidence, and the indorsement of payment, coinciding with the date of the deed, sufficiently tended to show their connection with the transaction to justify their admission in evidence. The views we have expressed are in harmony with the instructions given to the jury, to which appellants excepted, so far as they relate to the conveyance of the premises to the plaintiff; and the instructions requested by appellants which were refused, being inconsistent therewith, were properly refused. Whether the court erred in striking out the testimony of Laura A. Mowry is immaterial, as that was directed to the mental incapacity of Sylvester Mowry, and no question is made here as to the fact of his capacity to make the conveyance. We have examined all the questions presented by appellant, but find no error which would justify a reversal. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SMITH v. ELLIS et al. (No. 19,294.)

Motion for New Trial — Specification of Errors.

Where, upon a motion for a new trial, some of the specifications are inartificially expressed, but are sufficient to point out the particulars in which it is claimed the evidence failed to support the findings, and neither the court nor the opposing party is left in doubt as to this, it is error to disregard such specifications, and hear the motion on the remaining ones.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by W. A. Smith against M. E. Ellis and others to set aside a deed as fraudulent. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and upon a motion by plaintiff for a new trial the court struck out some of plaintiff's specifications, and heard the motion on the remaining ones, and also denied plaintiff's motion for leave to amend his specifications. The motion for a new trial was denied, and plaintiff appealed from the order denying same, the order striking out specifications, the order denying motion to amend specifications, and the judgment. Judgment and order denying motion to amend specifications affirmed, and orders striking out specifications and denying motion for new trial reversed.

J. T. Houx, for appellant. J. W. Ballard, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action on the part of a judgment creditor of J. N. Ellis, Sr., to set aside as fraudulent a deed of conveyance of certain land in the county of Orange, executed by said J. N. Ellis to his daughter, M. E. Ellis, and to satisfy plaintiff's judgment out of said land. Findings and judgment were in favor of defendants, and plaintiff moved for a new trial on a statement of the case, specifying, among other things, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings. At the hearing of the motion for new trial the defendants moved the court to disregard the statement of the case and the specifications of insufficiency of the evidence therein, upon the ground that the specifications were insufficient to authorize the court to review the evidence; which motion the court granted to the extent of disregarding, and, in effect, striking out, six of the several specifications relied upon by plaintiff. The plaintiff then moved the court for leave to amend his statement by correcting and restating said specifications, which motion the court denied. Thereupon the court, upon the statement thus emasculated, heard the motion for new trial, and denied the same. The plaintiff appeals from said several orders and from the judgment.

1. A careful examination of the specifications objected to satisfies us that the action of the court in disregarding them was erroneous; that, while perhaps inartificially expressed in some respects, they were in no substantial respect insufficient to point the particulars in which it was claimed the evidence failed to support the findings. "The specification is not required to be made in any particular form of words, but, in some form, should distinguish each particular proposition of fact excepted to from all others found by the court or involved in a general verdict of a jury." Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 200, 29 Pac. 31. These requirements are sufficiently met by the specifications here in question. Neither the court nor the defendants are left in doubt as to the particulars in which the plaintiff deems the evidence insufficient to sustain the findings excepted to. They are not opened to the objection raised in the cases cited by respondent, either as being too general or in being a mere recital of what the evidence does show. Without stating them in detail, we regard them as fully up to the specifications held sufficient in Harnett v. Railroad Co., 78 Cal. 32, 20 Pac. 154. This being so, the plaintiff was entitled on his motion for a new trial to a ruling by the lower court upon the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain its findings in the light of these specifications, and the action of the court in the premises was the denial to plaintiff of a substantial right. Brenot v. Brenot (Cal.) 36 Pac. 672.

2. We think the findings sufficient to sustain the judgment, and the order of the court denying plaintiff's motion to amend his statement, in view of the conclusion above reached, was without prejudice. The judgment and the order denying plaintiff's right to amend statement are affirmed. The order striking out and disregarding plaintiff's specifications, and the order denying motion for new trial, are reversed, with directions to the trial court to hear the parties upon the alleged insufficiency of the evidence suggested by the said specifications, and thereupon to pass upon the motion for a new trial.

KENDALL v. PARKER et al. (No. 18,196.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1894.)

NONNEGOTIABLE NOTE—INDORSEMENT BY PAYEE—LIABILITY TO SECOND INDORSEE.

The payee of a nonnegotiable note, who transfers it by indorsement in blank, does not become liable, as the indorser of a negotiable note would, to the indorsee of his indorsee, where the second indorsement is also in blank, or "without recourse."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by William S. Kendall against J. A. Parker, E. F. Aiken, and J. F. Hill on a promissory note. From a judgment against him after his demurrer to the complaint was overruled, defendant Hill appeals. Reversed.

L. T. Hatfield, for appellant. Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment entered after appellant's demurrer had been overruled, appellant standing upon his demurrer. The complaint is upon a promissory note, which is nonnegotiable, because it contains a stipulation for an attorney's fee. Suit is brought by the assignee of the first assignee against the makers and the payee as indorser. The complaint avers that Hill assigned the note by writing his name upon the back thereof, and by delivering the same to the Huntington-Hopkins Company before the maturity of the note. The Huntington-Hopkins Company, upon the maturity of the note, presented the same to the makers, and demanded payment thereof. The said makers refused and failed to pay the same, or any part thereof, of which demand and failure due notice was given to the defendant Hill. The note was transferred to plaintiff by the Huntington-Hopkins Company, without recourse, and after maturity. The complaint was demurred to on several grounds, all, however, founded upon the proposition that the complaint fails to show any liability on the part of Hill. Plaintiff had judgment, not only for the debt which the note was given to secure, but for $100 attorney's fee. The stipulation in regard to an attorney's fee in the note is: "And in case suit is instituted to collect this note, or any portion thereof, we, or either of us, promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorney's fees in said suit."

The question here presented is whether, when the payee of a nonnegotiable note transfers the same by a simple indorsement in blank, he becomes liable as the indorser of a negotiable note would, not only to his immediate indorsee, but to the indorsee of his indorsee; the second indorsement being also in blank, or, as in this case, "without recourse." It was held in England, prior to the statute of 3 & 4 Anne, that by the custom of merchants, when the payee indorsed his name upon a negotiable note, intending thereby to transfer it, the indorsee was at liberty to write over the signature not only an assignment, but a conditional guaranty of payment. The law thus made for the indorser of such a paper a contract not expressed, and which, independently of the law, there was nothing in the nature of the transaction to indicate. Independently of statute law, there is no custom or rule of law which can add such a condition to the assignment of a nonnegotiable note. In many states, however, there are statutory provisions on the subject. In 1850 the legislature of this state passed an act in regard to bills of exchange and promissory notes (St. 1850, p. 247), the first and fourth sections of which are as follows:

"All notes in writing made and signed by any person, whereby he shall promise to pay to any other person or to his order or to the order of any other person or unto the bearer, any sum of money therein mentioned, shall be due and payable as therein expressed, and shall have the same effect and be negotiable in like manner as inland bills of exchange, according to the custom of merchants."

"The payees and indorsees of every such note, payable to them or their order, and the holders of every such note payable to bearer, may maintain actions for the sums of money therein mentioned, against the makers and indorsers of the same respectively, in like manner as in cases of inland bills of exchange, and not otherwise."

In Hamilton v. McDonald, 18 Cal. 128, this court had occasion to consider the liability of an indorser of a nonnegotiable promissory note, as affected by that act. There, as here, the action was against the first indorser by the indorsee of the first indorsee. It was contended that the action could not be maintained for want of privity. The court said: "The answer to this objection is to be found in the provisions of the statute regulating the rights and liabilities of the parties. The fourth section of the act of April, 1850, relative to bonds, duebills, etc., makes every assignor of a nonnegotiable note liable upon his assignment to the assignee of such note; and it is evident from the language used that it was not the intention to limit this liability to his immediate assignee. The rule at common law was that, as between the assignor and his immediate assignee, the assignment created the same liabilities and obligations on the part of the assignor as the indorsement of a negotiable note created on the part of the indorser. But in respect to subsequent holders, no privity or connection existed between them and the assignor, unless expressly created by the assignment; and, where this was not done, the immediate assignee was the only person who could maintain an action in his own name against the assignor. The statute places the subsequent holder upon the same footing with the original assignee, and gives him a right of action against every person from whom the instrument has passed by assignment." It is claimed that this statute was repealed by the Code, and a very different rule established. At common law, however, although the subsequent holder could only sue his immediate indorser in his own name, he could sue the more remote indorser at law in the name of his assignor, or could obtain relief against them in equity in his own name. Story, Prom. Notes, § 128. Whether the statute of 1850 is repealed or not under our practice, it cannot be doubted that such holder may still sue in his own name, if the liability of such indorser is admitted. It may be remarked here that neither under the statute of 1850 nor at common law would the instrument sued upon be considered a promissory note at all. Under the act of 1850 the note was required to be for the payment of a sum of money therein mentioned. According to Blackstone, a promissory note was an engagement in writing to pay a sum specified. 2 Bl. Comm. 467. Story says it is a written engagement to pay absolutely and unconditionally a certain sum of money (section 1, Prom. Notes); and the author expressly shows that the definition applies both to negotiable and nonnegotiable notes (section 3). See, also, Byles, Bills, 5-41; Chit. Bills, 548; 3 Kent, Comm. 74. The instrument is not a promissory note when there may be contingent additions. Smith v. Nightingale, 2 Starkie, 375; Civ. Code, § 3244. The note involved in Hamilton v. McDonald, supra, had all the elements of a negotiable note, except that it was not payable to bearer or to order. But has the Code made no change in this matter? Section 3087, Civ. Code, defines a negotiable instrument as "a written promise or request for the payment of a certain sum of money to order or bearer in conformity to the provisions of this Code," and all the provisions of the Code in relation to the liability of drawers and indorsers and in reference to demand, notice, and protest are expressly limited to such instruments. Moreover, section 1774, Id., defines what liabilities one incurs who sells or agrees to sell other choses in action. Originally this section contained a further provision, which was stricken out in 1874, that such seller thereby warrants the instrument to be what it purports to be, and to be binding according to its purport upon all the parties thereto. Some of the liabilities created by this section are identical with those created by section 3116, Id., as to the parties to the assignment of negotiable paper, and others are evidently in lieu of them.

In view of these sections, can it be said that the rule established by the act of 1850 is still in force? Bank v. Falkenhan, 94 Cal. 141, 29 Pac. 866, is cited as authority for the judgment entered in this case. That action was brought by the first indorsee against his immediate indorser, and the note was indorsed with an express waiver of protest. This was held to be an indication that the indorser expected to be held as a guarantor. The writer quotes a rule laid down in Gerard v. La Coste, 1 Hare & W. Am. Lead. Cas. 302, note, to the effect that a mere indorsement is but a transfer of the note, and whether any and what liability is incurred by the transfer by indorsement and delivery of such a note will depend upon the intention of the parties and the circumstances of the transaction. It is expressly stated that this rule is sufficient for the case in hand. What follows in regard to an alleged further rule upon the subject must be regarded as obiter. The case does not support the position of respondent. The judgment against Hill is reversed, and the court directed to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

Ex parte MAIER. (No. 21,116.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1894.)

VIOLATION OF GAME LAWS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Section 626, Pen. Code (as amended St. 1893, p. 280), providing that every person who shall at any time sell or offer for sale the hide or meat of any deer shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, prohibits the sale of deer meat brought from without, as well as that taken within the state.

2. Such act is not in excess of the police power of the state.

3. Such act is not unconstitutional, as an attempt to regulate interstate commerce, the meat not having been sold in original packages.

In bank.

Petition for habeas corpus by Simon Maier, who was arrested for unlawfully selling deer meat. Writ denied.

Hunsaker, Goodrich & McCutcheon, for petitioner. H. C. Dillon, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Petitioner was arrested and is held in restraint under a warrant issued out of the police court of the city of Los Angeles, based on a complaint charging him, under section 626 of the Penal Code, with unlawfully selling, on the 18th day of December, 1893, at said city, one pound of deer meat, which meat, the complaint alleges, "was then and there by said Simon Maier cut from the carcass of an entire deer, which said deer had been theretofore brought by said Simon Maier from the state of Texas, in which state said deer had been lawfully killed." Petitioner asks for his discharge on habeas corpus, upon the ground that the complaint does not state a public offense, and, if that be true, there is no question but that he is entitled to his discharge in this proceeding. Ex parte Corryell, 22 Cal. 179; Ex parte Harrold, 47 Cal. 129; Ex parte Kearney, 55 Cal. 212. Section 626 is one of the provisions of the Penal Code for the preservation and protection of the wild game of this state, and the particular paragraph or subdivision of the section under which petitioner is charged (as amended, St. 1893, p. 280) reads: "Every person in the state of California who shall at any time sell, or offer for sale, the hide or meat of any deer, elk, antelope or mountain sheep, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." Petitioner contends that this provision of the statute, properly construed, does not prohibit the sale of deer meat lawfully taken without the state, but has reference solely to deer killed within this state; that the law is intended to protect game within the state, not to prohibit the importation and sale of game from other states. With this contention we are unable to agree. It is true the law is intended for the protection of the game within the state, but it by no means follows from that fact that it is not the intention, as a means to accomplish that very end, to prohibit the sale of the meat of the animals procured elsewhere. The statute is perfectly plain and unambiguous in its terms, and is sufficiently broad and comprehensive to include the inhibited article wheresoever taken or procured. It does not confine itself in terms or by implication to the meat of deer killed in this state, but denounces as unlawful the sale of the meat of any deer; and there is nothing elsewhere in the statute tending to give it a more restricted sense. The language is too plain to leave room for construction, and we are not at liberty, even if so disposed, to place a limitation upon the meaning of the legislature which its language will not support. But we have no doubt that the legislature intended exactly what its words import. Aside from the explicit language in which this particular provision is couched, an examination of the various changes which these sections of the Code relating to protection of game have undergone at the hands of the legislature is persuasively convincing of the intention to do just what this act does by its terms,—entirely prohibit traffic in the meat of these game animals within the state, no matter where killed. And it need hardly be suggested that such a provision, if enforced, will lend great aid to the attainment of the object sought. The facility and ease with which the statutes for the protection of game have been evaded in the past is a matter of common knowledge. Deer and other game have been slaughtered during the close season, and foisted upon the market as game procured without the state; and, owing to the practical impossibility in the great majority of cases of proving with certainty the source from which it was procured, the attempted enforcement of the statutes for its protection has largely proven abortive. These and like considerations no doubt actuated the legislature in the premises, and induced the enactment of the statute in its present stringent form; and we know of no good reason why it should not be held to mean what it says.

Similar statutes in other states have received a like construction. In Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 331, involving a statute of Illinois making it unlawful to sell or have in possession quail and certain other game birds during the close season, and which was not in terms limited to birds taken in the state, it was contended, as here, that the statute did not condemn the possession or sale of the birds taken and killed beyond the limits of the state, and shipped into the state for sale. But the court held that the statute must be taken as comprehending within its terms the prohibited game, no matter where taken. It is there said: "But it is argued that this cannot be the fair construction, because such a prohibition does not tend to protect the game of this state. To this there seems to be two answers: First. The language is clear and free of ambiguity, and in such case there is no room for construction; the language must be held to mean just what it says. Second. It cannot be said to be within judicial cognizance that such a prohibition does not tend to protect the game of this state. It being conceded, as it tacitly is by the argument, that preventing the entrapping, netting, ensnaring, etc., of wild fowls, birds, etc., during certain seasons of the year tends to the protection of wild fowls, birds, etc., we think it obvious that the prohibition of all possession and sales of such wild fowls or birds during the prohibited seasons would tend to their protection, in excluding the opportunity for the evasion of such law by clandestinely taking them, when secretly killed or captured here, beyond the state, and afterwards bringing them into the state for sale, or by other subterfuges and evasions." The court of appeals of New York held to the same effect under a statute very like ours, saying: "The penalty is denounced against the selling or possession after that time [close of the open season] irrespective of the place of killing." Phelps v. Racey, 60 N. Y. 10. In Whitehead v. Smithers, 2 C. P. Div. 553, Lord Coleridge held that under an English statute for the protection of British game, which made it unlawful to sell or have in possession plover during the close season, a party who imported the dead birds from Holland and sold them in the British market came within the prohibition of the statute, and said: "It is said it would be a strong thing for the legislature of the United Kingdom to interfere with the rights of foreigners to kill birds. But it may well be that the true and only mode of protecting British wild fowl from indiscriminate slaughter, as well as protecting other British interests, is by interfering indirectly with the proceedings of foreign persons. The object is to prevent British wild fowl from being improperly killed, and sold under pretense of their being imported from abroad." See, also, State v. Judy, 7 Mo. App. 524, and State v. Farrell, 23 Mo. App. 176.

The cases relied upon by petitioner are clearly distinguishable from the cases referred to above. In most of them, as in Com. v. Hall, 128 Mass. 410, and People v. O'Neil, 71 Mich. 325, 39 N. W. 1, the statutes under consideration contained a provision making possession of the game during the close season prima facie evidence of a violation of the law, and the construction of the prohibitive features of the statute largely turned upon the effect of that provision. In Com. v. Hall, which is followed by the Michigan case, it is said: "Saying that possession should be prima facie evidence necessarily implies that it shall not be conclusive. If the mere possession of birds, during the time within which the taking or killing them is prohibited, of itself constituted an offense under the previous sections of the statute, to say that such possession would be prima facie evidence would be superfluous, if not absurd." And it is held that the statute must, therefore, be construed as referring only to game unlawfully taken within the state during the close season. As suggested by counsel for the people, our statute contained a similar provision up to 1883, when the legislature by an amendment (St. 1883, p. 80) eliminated it, thereby evincing an intention to remove from the law anything calculated to qualify or limit its otherwise plain and explicit terms. We have no doubt that the intention of section 626 is to prohibit the sale of deer meat brought from without, as well as that taken within, the state. Nor do we think that in giving the act this effect it contravenes the constitution of this state as being in excess of the police power of the state. The wild game within a state belongs to the people in their collective, sovereign capacity. It is not the subject of private ownership, except in so far as the people may elect to make it so; and they may, if they see fit, absolutely prohibit the taking of it, or any traffic or commerce in it, if deemed necessary for its protection or preservation, or the public good. To this extent it is conceded that the state may go. But it is contended that to go further, and prohibit the sale of game lawfully killed elsewhere and brought here as private property, is in effect to destroy private property, and that this is going beyond a proper exercise of the police power. While it is true that the power to regulate is not the power to destroy, in its absolute sense, it is nevertheless true that the right to regulate frequently and as a necessary sequence carries with it the right to so control and limit the use or enjoyment of private property as to amount to its destruction. In the case of Phelps v. Racey, supra, the same objection was raised, and it is there said: "The objection of a want of power in the legislature to pass the act is not tenable. It is not in conflict with the state constitution, within the case of Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 378. That case involved the validity of the prohibitory liquor law, and determined that such law, so far as it applied to and substantially destroyed property in liquors owned or possessed at the time the act took effect, was in violation of the provision of the state constitution which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; but impliedly, if not necessarily, it affirmed the power if the law had only applied to liquors subsequently manufactured and acquired. Here the property was acquired subsequent to the passage of the act, and with the presumed knowledge of its provisions and conditions. The legislature may pass many laws the effect of which may be to impair, or even destroy, the right of property. Private interest must yield to the public advantage. All legislative powers not restrained by express or implied provisions of the constitution may be exercised. The protection and preservation of game has been secured by law in all civilized countries, and may be justified on many grounds, one of which is for purposes of food. The measures best adapted to this end are for the legislature to determine, and courts cannot review its discretion." And these principles have been repeatedly upheld. In some instances their enforcement may work hardship, but we see no such result here. The statute does not prevent a party from importing all the venison he wants for his own use or consumption, if he desires to do so. It simply says that for the better protection of the rights of the people in these wild animals, and as a means of preventing their destruction, the meat shall not be a lawful article of sale. There can be no serious injury to any one under such a regulation. If any person imports the meat of the deer into the state he does it with his eyes open, and a knowledge of the purposes for which the law permits it, just as the petitioner did here. Under such circumstances he cannot complain if he is prevented from making a use of the article which the legislature has declared to be detrimental to the well-being of the state. As suggested in Phelps v. Racey, supra, he acquired the property after the passage of the act, and his rights in it are necessarily subject to the regulations imposed upon its use.

It is further strenuously urged, however, that the act so construed violates the constitution of the United States, in that it is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce,—a subject wholly committed to congress. But, after a very careful consideration of the numerous authorities cited in support of this view, we do not think the statute open to this objection. It is true, its enforcement may indirectly or incidentally affect to some extent traffic in the inhibited article between the people of this and other states, but that of itself is not sufficient to bring it within the objection urged. The right of the states, under the very comprehensive police power reserved to them under our dual system of government to regulate and control their own internal affairs, including trade, to the reasonable advantage and good of their people is conceded and upheld in all the cases in which the questions growing out of the right of the federal congress to regulate interstate commerce has arisen. The only difficulty has been in defining the limitations of that power. In Railroad Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 470, it is said: "We admit that the deposit in congress of the power to regulate foreign commerce and commerce among the states was not a surrender of that which may properly be denominated police power. What that power is it is difficult to define with sharp precision. It is generally said to extend to making regulations promotive of domestic order, morals, health, and safety. As was said in Thorp v. Railroad Co., 27 Vt. 149: 'It extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, comfort, and quiet of all persons and the protection of all property within the state according to the maxim "sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas," which, being of universal application, it must, of course, be within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which every one may so use his own as not to injure others.' It was further said that by the general police power of a state 'persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens, in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state; of the perfect right of the legislature to do which no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged principles, ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned.'" "Many acts of a state," say the court further in that case, "may indeed affect commerce without amounting to a regulation of it in the constitutional sense of the term. And it is sometimes difficult to define the distinction between that which merely affects or influences and that which regulates or furnishes a rule for conduct." And in the celebrated cases commonly designated as "The License Cases," 5 How. 504, it is held that the fact that a regulation may incidentally and to a certain extent affect commerce between the states does not affect its validity. In Pierce v. New Hampshire (one of the license cases, supra,) Mr. Justice Woodbury, in one of the opinions of the majority of the court, in discussing this power of the states, says: "The subject of buying and selling within a state is one as exclusively belonging to the power of the state over its internal trade as that to regulate foreign commerce is with the general government, under the broadest construction of that power." "The idea, too, that a prohibition to sell would be tantamount to a prohibition to import does not seem to me either logical or founded in fact; for, even under a prohibition to sell, a person could import, as he often does, for his own consumption and that of his family and plantations; and also, a merchant extensively engaged in commerce often does import articles with no view of selling them here, but of storing them for a higher and more suitable market in another state or abroad." In the subsequent case of Bowman v. Railway Co., 125 U. S. 465, 8 Sup. Ct. 689, 1062, the same court held a statute of Iowa, which forbid any common carrier to bring into the state for any person or corporation any intoxicating liquors from any state or territory void, as being an unwarrantable interference with interstate commerce, and not a legitimate exercise of police power, in that it was more than a regulation of its own internal affairs or an exercise of the jurisdiction of the state over persons and property within its limits. "It is an attempt," say the court, "to exert that jurisdiction over persons and property within the limits of other states. It seeks to prohibit and stop their passage and importation into its own limits, and is designed as a regulation of commerce before the merchandise is brought to its border. * * * It is not a regulation confined to the purely internal and domestic commerce of the state. It is not a restriction which only operates upon property after it has become mingled with and forms part of the mass of the property within the state. * * * But the right to prohibit sales, so far as conceded to the states, arises only after the act of transportation has terminated, because the sales which the state may forbid are of things within its jurisdiction." And it is held that the state cannot, under the guise of a police regulation, prevent the importation of legitimate articles of commerce and trade. And in the later case of Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 10 Sup. Ct. 681, it was held that, it not being within the power of the state to prohibit the importation of lawful commodities, neither can she prohibit the sale by the importer of such commodities upon their receipt by him, since the right to sell any article imported was an inseparable incident to the right to import it. But this right of sale was distinctly limited to the right of the importer to sell or dispose of the article imported in its original, unbroken package or condition as brought by him into the state, and the principle is in that case, as in Bowman v. Railway Co. and the other cases cited, distinctly upheld, that the authority of congress over any article of commerce imported into a state ceases "when the importer has so acted upon it that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, which happens when the original package is no longer such in his hands," and that thereupon the property becomes subject to the jurisdiction of the state, and affected and controlled by its regulations. Tested by these principles, we cannot see wherein the statute, applying its provisions to the case made in the complaint, is open to the objection that it attempts to or does regulate interstate commerce. Petitioner imported the meat into the state, broke the original package, and put the commodity upon the market. It thereupon became property strictly subject to state regulation and control, and falls within the denunciation of the statute. Whether petitioner could have sold the meat as an entire carcass is a question which does not confront us, and which it is not, therefore, necessary to determine. We think the complaint states a cause of action, and it follows that the petitioner should be remanded. It is so ordered.

In re FAIR'S ESTATE. (No. 15,311.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—RIGHTS OF DEVISEES.

Testatrix devised her entire estate to executors in trust until complete disposition thereof as directed by the will. She then bequeathed to each of her two daughters a certain sum, to be paid to her when 25 years old; to her son J. $500,000, to be paid to him when 35 years old; and to her son C. $500,000, to be paid to him when 30 years old. She then directed that, in case J. should die without leaving a wife or lawful issue, his portion should be paid to C., if living; that, in case C. should die without leaving a wife or lawful issue, his portion should be paid to J., if living; and that, in case both J. and C. should die without wife or lawful issue surviving them, their portions should be paid to the daughters. J. died before he was 35 years old, leaving neither wife nor child. Held, that C. was not entitled to J.'s portion until the time when J. would attain the age of 35 if living.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition by Charles L. Fair for an order directing the executors of the estate of Theresa Fair, deceased, to pay to him the sum of $500,000, bequeathed to his brother, James G. Fair, Jr., and which, by the terms of the will, was to be paid to petitioner in case of the death of the latter. From an order denying the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Goodfellow, for appellant. R. S. Messick and Byron Waters, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. When this case was in department the following opinion was prepared by Commissioner HAYNES:

"Appellant petitioned the court below for an order directing the executors of the will of Theresa Fair, deceased, to pay to him the sum of $500,000, bequeathed to his brother, James G. Fair, Jr., and which, in case of the death of James, was, by the terms of the will, to be paid to petitioner. This appeal is from an order denying said petition.

"The proper determination of the questions involves the consideration and construction of the whole of the will, which, omitting formal parts, is as follows: 'I hereby give, bequeath, and devise all my real and personal estate, of what nature or kind soever and wheresoever situated, to John W. Mackay and Richard V. Dey, the executors of my last will and testament, hereinafter nominated and appointed, in trust for the payment of my just debts and the legacies and charges upon the said estate hereinafter specified; to be held and possessed by them, with power to sell and dispose of the same, or any part thereof, at public or private sale, at such time or times and upon such terms and in such manner as to them shall seem meet, and to reinvest any surplus proceeds of such sales for the best interest of said estate until the full and complete disposition of said estate by them, which I hereby direct shall by them be made in compliance with the following: I give and bequeath to my daughter Theresa Alice Fair the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, and direct the same to be paid to her upon her attaining the age of twenty-five years, but not before then, and that meantime there shall be paid to her monthly the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars. I give and bequeath to my daughter Virginia Fair the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, and direct the same to be paid to her upon her attaining the age of twenty-five years, but not before then, and that meantime there shall be paid to her monthly the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars. I give and bequeath to my son James Graham Fair, Jr., the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, and direct the same to be paid to him when he shall have attained the age of thirty-five years, but not before then, and that meantime there shall be paid to him monthly the sum of five hundred dollars. I give and bequeath to my son Charles Lewis Fair the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, and direct the same to be paid to him when he shall have attained the age of thirty years, but not before then, but that meantime there shall be paid to him monthly the sum of five hundred dollars. The rest and residue of my estate I give and bequeath to my two daughters above named, to be divided between them equally, share and share alike, and to be paid to them when my said daughter Virginia shall have attained the age of twenty-five years. In case my said son James Graham Fair, Jr., shall die without wife or lawful issue surviving him, the portion allotted to him shall be paid to my said son Charles Lewis Fair, if living, and, if not living, then to his surviving wife or lawful issue, if any there be. In case my said son Charles Lewis Fair shall die without wife or lawful issue surviving him, the portion allotted to him shall be paid to the said James Graham Fair, Jr., if living, and, if not living, then to his surviving wife or lawful issue, if any there be. In case both the said James Graham Fair, Jr., and Charles Lewis Fair shall die without wife or lawful issue surviving them, then the portions allotted them shall be paid to my said daughters, Theresa Alice Fair and Virginia Fair, share and share alike. In case of the death of my said daughter Theresa Alice Fair without husband or child surviving her, the portion allotted to her shall be paid one-half to my daughter Virginia Fair and the other half in equal portions to the said James Graham Fair, Jr., and Charles Lewis Fair. And in case of the death of my said daughter Virginia Fair without husband or child surviving her, the portion allotted to her shall be paid one-half to my daughter Theresa Alice Fair and the other half in equal portions to my sons, James Graham Fair, Jr., and Charles Lewis Fair, aforesaid.' The executors therein named were duly appointed, and qualified in October, 1891.

"The court found that appellant was of the age of 25 years, and no more; that James G. Fair, Jr., died on the 12th day of February, 1892, under the age of 30 years, and had never married; that the estate was but little indebted; and that the sum of $500,000 prayed for by the petitioner might be allowed to him, if he were entitled thereto, without loss to the creditors of the estate. As conclusions of law the court found: 'That by the terms of said will the petitioner is not entitled to have or receive the sum of $500,000 prayed for by him until he shall have attained the age of thirty years; that his petition is, therefore, premature, and should be denied.' The order denying said petition was entered February 16, 1893.

"Appellant's contention is that, as survivor of his brother, he became entitled to said legacy immediately upon the death of James G. Fair, Jr.; and respondents contend, in their brief, that it is not payable to Charles until, by the terms of the will, it would have been payable to James, had he lived, nor until Charles had arrived at the age of 30 years. The will does not state the dates at which the several legatees will respectively arrive at the age at which their several legacies would become payable. Nevertheless the times for the payment of the several legacies are as definitely fixed, in case none of them should die before reaching the designated age, as though the year, month, and day of the payment of each had been stated in the will, instead of the age of the legatee, as these dates must be definitely ascertained before payment could be made of the several original bequests. These clauses of the will relating to the time of payment of the original bequests may therefore be read as though the dates of the payments were specified, instead of the ages of the several legatees; and the question is whether there is any provision in the will manifesting the intention of the testatrix that, in case of the death of the legatee, the legacy should be payable to the survivor at a different or earlier date. The will does not expressly state at what time the death of the original legatee should occur to entitle the survivor to the legacy which would otherwise have gone to the deceased brother or sister, nor whether the date of payment should thereby be changed, and therefore these questions must be left to construction. It is obvious, however, that the payment of any of these original legacies to the legatee upon arriving at the prescribed age takes the money so paid out of and beyond the operation of the will, which imposes no conditions or restrictions of any character upon it after its payment to the legatee; and therefore all facts and circumstances affecting its disposition must exist or occur at or before the death of the primary legatee.

"James having died unmarried, the provision relating to a surviving wife or lawful issue need not be considered.

"Recurring, then, to the question whether there is anything in the will authorizing the payment of the legacy in question to Charles at an earlier date than that fixed for the payment to James, I think the answer must be in the negative. The language of the clause principally in question does not require such earlier payment. If the language were 'upon' the death of James, or in case of the death of James, his portion shall 'then' be paid to Charles, there would be a reasonably clear expression of an intention to change the time of payment; but the language, 'in case of the death of James, his portion shall be paid to Charles,' does not enable us to say that the testatrix intended such earlier payment; and, if we look to the other provisions of the will, I think it clearly appears therefrom that such was not her intention. The will devised and bequeathed the entire estate to Mackay and Dey in trust, to be held and possessed by them, with power to sell and dispose of it and reinvest any surplus proceeds for the best interests of the estate. It was inevitable that all of the estate should remain in their hands for a time, and it was important that the times at which the trust should terminate as to the different portions or legacies should be definitely fixed, so as to enable them to best preserve and increase the estate, and be prepared to pay the different legacies when they became payable. This was done, and, in view of the interests of the estate as a whole, and the proper discharge of their duties by the trustees, it ought to require at least a reasonably clear expression of intention to make the time of payment depend upon the happening of contingencies in their nature uncertain to justify the court in holding that such change in the time of payment was intended. That the time of payment of the several legacies is not changed by the accident of the death of any of them, but only the person to whom they are to be paid, is apparent from the several provisions of the will; provisions that cannot be complied with if appellant's contention is to prevail.

"It will be observed that there is a similar provision in favor of James in case Charles shall first die, and a further provision that, in case James and Charles both die without wife or lawful issue surviving them, the portions allotted to James and Charles shall 'be paid' to their sisters, Theresa and Virginia. In all these cases the money to 'be paid' is to be paid by the executors, and necessarily implies that the money must remain in their hands until the time arrives when no contingency could happen under the terms of the will making it payable to another than the first survivor. As each of the brothers had a contingent right to the legacy of the other, so the sisters have a contingent right to the legacies of both James and Charles; a right that could not avail them as to the legacy given to James if appellant's contention is correct. If, for example, the executors had paid to James the legacy in question in his lifetime, Charles could well insist, when the time arrived at which James would have attained the age of 35 years, that that sum should have been in their hands, as, upon the contingency of the death of James under that age, he was entitled to it; and so the sisters might well insist, if the executors had paid the legacy in question to Charles, and afterwards, and before James would have attained the age of 35, Charles had died, that they were entitled not only to the legacy of Charles which remained in the hands of the executors, but also to the legacy of James, since the contingency had happened upon which the executors were directed by the will to pay it to them; and to this claim, if the executors had voluntarily paid the legacy of James to Charles, they could oppose no possible defense. I do not think that the time of the payment of the legacy in question depends upon Charles' arriving at the age of 30 years, but that in no event is it payable until the date at which James would have arrived at the age of 35; for, if Charles should arrive at the age of 30 before that date, and the bequest to James should then be paid to him, and he should afterwards die before the date at which it was payable to James, the sisters would be deprived of the contingent bequest to them of the same legacy. Other possible contingencies, not arising upon the facts contained in the record, may yet arise, but none, I think, which can affect the conclusion stated. The conclusion of the court below that Charles would be entitled to the legacy in question if he were 30 years of age, I think, is erroneous, but, as the judgment of dismissal is right, it should be affirmed.

"We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C."

After full consideration of the case in bank, we are satisfied with the foregoing opinion, and with the conclusions therein reached; and for the reasons therein given the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

TAYLOR v. ABBOTT et al. (No. 19,392.)

Appropriation of Water — Sufficiency of Notice.

1. A notice on surveyed public lands that a person had on a certain day "located" a spring and water right, and "claims" all the water in the spring and flowing from it, is not in conformity with Civil Code, § 1415, which provides for a notice at the point of intended diversion stating the number of inches, measured on a four-foot pressure, claimed, the purpose for which it is claimed, and the place of intended use, etc.

2. On December 17th, plaintiff posted a defective notice of his intention to divert water, and made an excavation in the spring three feet deep and three feet wide at the place of intended diversion. He also bought some pipe and lumber with which to complete the diversion, but never connected them with the spring. On December 28th, defendant, under the act of April 20, 1852, took possession of the land on which the spring was located, built himself a house thereon, and moved his family there, and filed the necessary affidavit. Held, that the work done by plaintiff did not constitute possession, and that neither his intentions, declarations, nor preparations were equivalent to actual possession.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Action by Taylor against Abbott and others to enjoin interference with plaintiff in constructing a diversion of water. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Daly & Toland, for appellant. H. L. Poplin and Blackstock & Ewing, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff posted a notice December 17, 1892, near a spring of water upon certain surveyed public lands in the county of Ventura, stating that he had that day "located" the spring and water right, and "claims" all water in the spring and flowing from it. On the same day he made an excavation in the spring, about three feet square and three feet in depth, for the purpose of marking the place of his intended diversion. A few days afterwards he bought some pipe and lumber with which to complete the means of diverting the water, but did not in fact make any connection with the spring, or complete his intended diversion of the water. On the 28th of December the defendant went upon the land where the spring was located, took possession thereof, built himself a house and moved his family into it, and thereafter held possession of the land, and on the 20th of February, 1893, filed an affidavit in conformity with the requirements of the possessory act of April 20, 1852.

After the defendant had taken possession of this land the plaintiff attempted to complete his diversion of the water from the spring, but was prevented from so doing by the defendant. The plaintiff brought this action February 21, 1893, to enjoin the defendant from interfering with him in completing such diversion. The cause was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff has appealed.

The plaintiff, by this action, seeks preventive relief for the future, rather than redress for a past wrong; and his right to this remedy is to be determined by the respective rights of the parties as they were at the commencement of the action. At that time the defendant was in possession and occupancy of the land which included the spring, and had filed his affidavit under the possessory act. Under the provisions of section 1 of this act (St. 1852, p. 158), he was entitled to "maintain any action for interference with or injuries done to his possession of said land against any person or persons so interfering with or injuring such land or possession," and would necessarily have the same right to defend his possession and rights in the land in any action brought against him. After he had thus taken possession of the land, any threats or conduct on his part by which the plaintiff was prevented from completing his diversion of the water would be in support of his own rights, rather than a wrong against the plaintiff, unless the plaintiff had acquired a right to such diversion superior to the defendant's rights in the land. The court finds that on the 28th day of December, 1892, when the defendant settled upon the land, there was no other in the possession or occupation thereof, and that prior to the commencement of this action, viz. on the 20th of February, the defendant had filed his affidavit under the possessory act, and that his acts in preventing the plaintiff from completing his attempted diversion of the water were for the purpose of protecting his possessory claim. The evidence before the court was ample to sustain this finding, so that it is unnecessary to determine whether the specifications of its insufficiency are such as to preclude it from being considered. It may be conceded that, if the plaintiff had completed the diversion of the water before the defendant had acquired any rights in the land, the plaintiff's rights would have been superior to that of the defendant. Wells v. Mantes, 99 Cal. 583, 34 Pac. 324. There is, however, no allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff was in possession of the land upon which the spring was located, nor does he claim to have been in the actual occupancy thereof, or to have had any possession other than such as followed from his notice and the digging out of the spring on the 17th of December. His subsequent purchase of pipe, and causing it to be hauled to a point "towards said springs", and several hundred feet distant therefrom, did not tend to establish a possession of the spring, or of the land on which it was located. The notice posted by him at the spring did not conform to the requirements of section 1415 of the Civil Code, and he cannot therefore claim any rights thereunder as an appropriator of the water. The posting of this notice was admitted by the answer, so that its exclusion by the court when offered in evidence did not constitute any error.

The plaintiff is not entitled to the relief sought herein by virtue of the provisions of section 2339 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That section does not confer the right to enter upon lands in the possession of another for the purpose of securing the water thereon, or of completing an attempted diversion of water, even though the person seeking so to enter had at some previous time manifested his intention to secure a water right thereon. It merely provides for protecting such rights to the use of water as may have "vested and accrued" by priority of possession, and as are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of courts. Whether the defendant would have had the right to interfere with the plaintiff if, at the time of his entry upon the land, the plaintiff had been actually engaged in laying pipes for the diversion of the water thereon, depends upon other principles of law, and is not presented in the present case. De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 400, 20 Pac. 563, and 22 Pac. 198, merely holds that when the diversion of the water has been completed before a subsequent pre-emptor acquires any right in the land, it is superior to the pre-emptor's right. The plaintiff was not in possession of the land when the defendant entered thereon, and neither can his intentions or declarations, any more than his preparations to complete the diversion, be regarded as equivalent to an actual possession. Digging at the spring did not constitute possession, but was merely an act indicative of an intention to claim the water, and was to be considered by the court, in connection with other evidence, for the purpose of determining whether the land was vacant. The finding of the court upon this subject must be regarded as determinative of the question.

There are other errors assigned in the admission and exclusion of evidence, but they are not of such a character as require consideration. The judgment and order are affirmed.

VALENTINE v. SLOSS et al. (No. 15,432.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1894.)

In bank.

Action by Thomas B. Valentine against Louis Sloss and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

For former report, see 37 Pac. 326.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause, and from the judgment of the department. The district court had jurisdiction to hear exceptions to the Matthewson survey, and to confirm it independently of the act of congress of 1860. It had this jurisdiction by virtue of the fact that the decree confirming the grant was its own decree, and not, as in the case of U. S. v. Sepulveda, 1 Wall. 104, the decree of the land commission. This case also differs from the Sepulveda Case in the important fact that the grant was not a floating grant within extensive and indefinite boundaries, but was a grant of a tract with specific boundaries, and therefore peculiarly and appropriately subject to definite location by the court, according to the doctrine of U. S. v. Fossatt, 21 How. 445, and the cases therein cited. The Fossatt Case was cited in the Sepulveda Case; and, so far from overruling it, the court took especial pains to set forth the distinction upon which they held that in the Sepulveda Case the district court could acquire jurisdiction to correct the survey only under the act of 1860. I think the judgment of the superior court should have been reversed.

In re McLAUGHLIN'S ESTATE. (No. 15,409.)

Public Administrator — Guardian of Incompetent.

M. died in 1892, leaving, as her only heir at law, an incompetent person with a guardian. Code Civ. Proc. § 1368, which provided that a guardian of a minor was entitled to administration, was amended in 1893 so as to include the guardian of an incompetent person. Held, that the public administrator was not entitled to administration on the estate of M., in preference to the guardian, on the ground that at the death of M., and before the act was amended, he was so entitled, as his right to administration depended on his status at the time the letters were granted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Kate Kenney, as guardian of James H. McLaughlin, an incompetent person, applied for letters of administration on the estate of Catherine McLaughlin, deceased. A. C. Freese, public administrator of the city and county of San Francisco, at the same time applied for such letters. An order was made granting the letters to Kate Kenney, and denying the petition of A. C. Freese, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Sullivan and Herbert Choynski, for appellant. Beverly L. Hodghead and S. Bloom, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Catherine McLaughlin died intestate, in the city and county of San Francisco, on October 20, 1892, leaving estate therein, and leaving as her sole heir at law a son, 37 years old, named James H. McLaughlin, who had been duly adjudged to be an incompetent person. On March 17, 1893, the respondent, Kate Kenney, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting guardian of said James H. McLaughlin, filed in the superior court of said city and county her petition asking that letters of administration on the estate of Catherine McLaughlin be issued to her. On March 20, 1893, A. C. Freese, the public administrator of the city and county of San Francisco, filed his petition in the same court asking that letters of administration on the said estate be issued to him. The two petitions were heard at the same time, and on April 4, 1893, the court made and entered an order denying the petition of said A. C. Freese, and granting that of said Kate Kenney. From that order, said Freese appeals.

The only question to be determined is, was the guardian of the incompetent son or the public administrator entitled to letters of administration on the estate? Section 1368 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended on February 27, 1893, by inserting the words "or an incompetent person," and, as amended, it reads as follows: "If any person entitled to administration is a minor or an incompetent person, letters must be granted to his or her guardian, or any other person entitled to letters of administration, in the discretion of the court." It is clear that respondent was entitled to have the letters granted to her, if this section, as amended, was applicable to the case. It is claimed, however, for appellant, that the amendment was not retroactive, and was not applicable, because "the rights of the appellant had accrued, and were vested, at the date of the death of said deceased, and no subsequent act of the legislature could serve to divest the appellant of his right to letters of administration, and to invest the respondent with that right." This claim is not, in our opinion, supported by the authorities or reason. A public administrator does not, by virtue of his office, or by filing a petition for letters of administration upon the estate of a decedent, acquire any interest in the estate, or in the commissions to be earned by administering upon it. His status at the time of the grant of administration determines his competency. In re Pingree's Estate, 100 Cal. 78, 34 Pac. 521. The appellant had no vested right to letters, and the court properly exercised its discretion in granting the letters to the respondent. The order is affirmed.

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE — ASSUMPTION BY GRANTEE—DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT — REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. A grantee of mortgaged premises, who has assumed the mortgage, is liable, in an action of foreclosure, for a deficiency judgment.

2. Findings of fact by the trial court upon conflicting evidence will not be reviewed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by one Williams against Naftzger and others to foreclose a mortgage. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Collier & Evans, for appellants. Curtis, Otis & Curtis, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendants King and La Baron executed a mortgage to the plaintiff in 1887, upon certain lands in the county of San Bernardino, to secure the payment of their note for $2,000. In October, 1888, these defendants conveyed the mortgaged premises to their codefendants, Naftzger, Merrill, and Kanavel, subject to the lien of said mortgage; and the said grantees, as a part of the consideration for said conveyance, promised to pay said promissory note, and to secure the discharge and release of the mortgage. In July, 1891, each of these grantees signed and acknowledged a deed of conveyance, purporting to reconvey the premises to King and La Baron, subject to the said note and mortgage, and containing a clause by which King and La Baron assumed to pay and release the same. These instruments were placed in the hands of the defendant Naftzger, and he afterwards delivered them to the defendant La Baron, who caused them to be recorded in the office of the county recorder. Naftzger also paid to La Baron $500 to induce him to accept the deeds. The deeds were delivered by Naftzger to La Baron without the knowledge of King, nor did King ever accept the deeds, or in any way ratify their delivery to or acceptance by La Baron; nor did he agree to a reconveyance of the mortgaged property, or to release his grantees from the liability they had assumed by virtue of the terms of the conveyance to them. As soon as he learned that the deeds had been delivered to La Baron, he repudiated the transaction, and notified his grantees thereof. The plaintiff brings this action to foreclose his mortgage, and to recover judgment against each of the above defendants for any deficiency there may be after a sale of the mortgaged lands. King and La Baron made default, and at the trial upon the issues made by the answers of the other defendants the court found the above facts, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants Naftzger, Merrill, and Kanavel have appealed.

An agreement on the part of a grantee to pay and discharge a mortgage debt upon the granted premises, for which his grantor is liable, renders the grantee liable therefor to the mortgagee; and in an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage, if the mortgaged premises are insufficient to satisfy the mortgage debt, judgment may be rendered against him, as well as against the mortgagor, for the amount of such deficiency. This liability results from the familiar doctrine in equity that a creditor is entitled to the benefit of all securities or collateral obligations that his principal debtor may have given to the surety for the payment of the debt. By the conveyance of the mortgaged premises, and the assumption of the mortgage debt by the grantee, the latter, as between him and his grantor, becomes primarily liable to the mortgagee, and his vendor becomes his surety. Halsey v. Reed, 9 Paige, 452; Crowell v. Currier, 27 N. J. Eq. 154; Crawford v. Edwards, 33 Mich. 354; Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 622, 10 Sup. Ct. 494; Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609; Jones, Mortg. §§ 741, 752.

The appellants do not controvert this proposition, but urge in support of their appeal that the evidence was insufficient to justify the court in finding that King did not accept the deed. Upon this proposition, however, there was a sharp conflict in the evidence, and the finding of the court is not here open to review. See, also, Cordts v. Hargrave, 29 N. J. Eq. 446; Stuart v. Hervey, 36 Neb. 1, 53 N. W. 1032. If the deed was never delivered to or accepted by King, the appellants were not released from their obligation to him to discharge the mortgage debt, and the plaintiff is entitled to avail himself of this obligation for the purpose of obtaining a satisfaction of the debt created by King. The judgment and order are affirmed.

WATER RIGHTS.

Where plaintiff had the right to the water of a ditch and to a dam on defendant's land, which the latter used for the purpose of pasturing stock, defendant was not liable for injuries to the dam by the cattle tramping and treading the same, where plaintiff had the right to enter and protect the dam against such injuries.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by Frederick Keller against Charles Fink for damages to a dam. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Graves & Graves, for appellant. W. H. Spencer, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Plaintiff is the lessee of the Branch Flouring Mill, operated by the waters of Arroyo Grande creek. The dam and a portion of the ditch which conveys the water from the dam to the mill are upon defendant's land. It is claimed that defendant's horses, cattle, and hogs so injure the dam and ditch that plaintiff is deprived of water to run his mill for a considerable portion of the time, and prays judgment for the sum of $5,000. The answer denies all the allegations of the complaint, and, for a second defense, alleges that he uses his land for stock purposes in the usual manner, and that he has never, in any manner, intentionally injured, or permitted to be injured, said dam or ditch. The cause was tried before a jury, and a general verdict was returned for defendant, upon which judgment was entered, and this appeal is from the judgment and an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Respondent makes the point that the appeal from the order cannot be considered, because not taken in time. This objection must be sustained. A bill of exceptions was taken by plaintiff, and used on the hearing of the motion for a new trial. The only errors of law noticed in appellant's brief are that the court erred in refusing to give the third and the fourth instructions requested by plaintiff. There was no controversy as to the right of the plaintiff to maintain and use the dam and ditch. The question was as to the defendant's liability for casual injury thereto upon his lands, occasioned by his stock, which was kept upon his land in the manner in which such stock is usually kept, and which rightfully had access to the water. The third instruction, if it had been given, would have required the jury to find against the defendant if they found that he permitted his stock to injure the dam and ditch "by tramping and treading and cutting the same," whereby the water was prevented from flowing to plaintiff's mill. It was not contended that defendant had not the right to the water for his stock, nor, on the other hand, was there any denial of plaintiff's right to enter to make repairs, nor does it appear that plaintiff could not, without interfering with defendant's rights, have protected his dam and ditch, or that the dam might not have been so constructed and of such material that the stock could not injure it, instead of the temporary structure composed of brush and sand which existed. The fourth instruction requested was to the effect that, under the condition of things stated in the third request, the plaintiff was entitled to damages. These instructions were properly refused, and the instructions given fairly stated the law applicable to the facts developed by the evidence.

The plaintiff was not prejudiced by not being permitted to answer the question, "You say the profits have been $8 per day?" inasmuch as he did not make a case entitling him to any damages. An objection was properly sustained to the following question: "State whether or not it was worth while to repair the ditch so long as the defendant's stock are permitted to roam and go over the same?" Unless it was shown that it was the defendant's duty to protect the dam and ditch, or in some manner prevent his stock from injuring them, the question was immaterial, and we see nothing in the evidence imposing such duty upon the defendant. Plaintiff's objection to the question put to defendant, "Have you used this land of yours, which includes the creek, any different from the way you have used your other land?" was properly overruled. No one has the right to purposely or so negligently use his property as to imply a willingness to injure the property of another, or which creates an injury which would not result from its ordinary and lawful use, but each is bound to protect his property from such injury as may arise from the ordinary and lawful use by another of his own property. We see no ground upon which the judgment should be reversed, and advise that it be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed, and the judgment affirmed.

SHERER v. PARK NURSERY CO. (No. 19,355.)

SALE—WARRANTY OF FRUIT TREES—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—STATUTE CONSTRUED.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 3313, the damages for breach of warranty of the quality of fruit trees is the difference in the value between the kind of trees warranted and the trees actually delivered, at the time those delivered first bore fruit.

2. The damages for breach of warranty of the quality of fruit trees may be shown by the difference between the value of the land occupied by the trees at the time the breach is discovered, and the value such land would have had if the trees had been of the kind warranted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by J. C. Sherer against the Park Nursery Company to recover damages for breach of warranty of certain fruit trees. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Arthur and A. D. Yocum, for appellant. Spencer G. Millard, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant being a corporation engaged in the business of raising and selling nursery fruit trees, the plaintiff, on March 7, 1891, ordered from it 500 nursery peach trees, of specified varieties,—namely, 200 Susquehanna, 200 Muir, and 100 Salway; and thereupon defendant sold and delivered to plaintiff 500 young trees, at the price of 20 cents apiece, representing them to be of the varieties and in the proportions ordered, and so labeled them. The plaintiff did not know and had no means of ascertaining whether or not the trees were such as ordered until after he had planted them and had cultivated them about two years, when they first bore fruit, and therefore relied solely upon the representations of the defendant as to the varieties of the trees. When the trees first bore fruit, it appeared that 268 of them were of a different and inferior variety from either of those ordered, and were of a kind that plaintiff did not desire, and which, when planted, occupied about 2½ acres of plaintiff's land. The object of this action was to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff in consequence of a breach of the warranty that the trees were of the kinds ordered. The judgment was in favor of plaintiff for $350, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The principal point contended for by appellant is that the court did not measure the damages by the proper rule, which they say is that expressed by section 3313 of the Civil Code, as follows: "The detriment caused by the breach of the warranty of the quality of personal property is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value which the property would have had at the time to which the warranty referred, if it had been complied with, over its actual value at that time." To what time, in the sense of this section, does a warranty of the quality of personal property refer? Does it refer to the time of completion of the sale by delivery of the property, or to the time of the breach of the warranty, or to the time when the breach is discovered, or with ordinary care and attention might be discovered, by the purchaser? When the quality of the property is apparent, or with ordinary care may be ascertained at the time of delivery, all three of those conditions coexist at that time, as they did in the case of Hughes v. Bray, 60 Cal. 284, in which it was held that a warranty of barley referred to the time of delivery, and that the measure of damages was the difference between the market value of the (inferior) barley delivered and an equal quantity of the quality warranted at the time of delivery; and this, the court said, was in accordance with section 3313 of the Civil Code. And doubtless this was correct on the facts of that case, since the delivery, the breach of warranty, and presumable notice of such breach concurred in point of time; and it would have been equally correct to have said in that case that the measure of damages was the difference in values, etc., at the time of the breach of the warranty, or at the time the breach was discovered. But the court did not say, and surely did not intend to be understood as meaning, that all warranties of the class specified in section 3313 of Civil Code refer to the time of delivery of the property; since such a construction would not only be contrary to the common law as administered in the United States and England, but would effect rank injustice in a large class of cases, of which the case at bar is an example. Suth. Dam. §§ 673–676; Sedg. Dam. §§ 191, 768, and cases cited. Under such construction, the measure of plaintiff's damages in this action would be merely the difference between the value of the trees delivered and the same number of trees of the kinds ordered at the time of delivery, and before they were replanted by plaintiff; and so it would be in all cases of warranty of seeds. As to whether a warranty of this class refers to the time of the breach thereof, it is enough to say that if cases ever occur in which the purchaser suffers damage after the breach and before the time when he discovers, or with ordinary care and attention might discover, the defect in the property warranted, the warranty does not in such cases refer to the time of the breach, but to the time when the defect was or might have been discovered. The time of the breach depends upon the nature and meaning of the warranty. What was warranted? In this case I am inclined to the opinion that the defendant warranted that the trees would bear the kinds of fruit known by the names Susquehanna, Muir, and Salway peaches. If so, the breach occurred when they first bore a different kind of fruit; so that here, again, the breach and the discovery thereof were concurrent events. But, if such is not the meaning of this warranty, the breach must have occurred at the time the trees were delivered. But since it seems probable that cases of the class specified in section 3313, Civ. Code, may occur in which the breach and the discovery thereof are widely separate in point of time, the only reasonable construction of that section which may have a uniformly just effect is that the time to which the warranty refers is the time when the breach thereof is, or with due diligence might be, discovered by the purchaser.

The action of the trial court in admitting evidence against the objections of defendant was consistent with this construction. The sole effect of such evidence was to prove the difference between the value of trees of the kinds ordered by plaintiff and the trees actually delivered by defendant, at the time when those delivered first bore fruit; that being the earliest date at which plaintiff discovered, or could have discovered, the breach of the warranty. It was, however, to the mode of proving this difference of values that defendant more specially objected, which was (1) to prove the value of the land occupied by the trees at the time the breach of warranty was discovered; and (2) the value the land would have had, at the same time, if trees of the kinds and proportions ordered by plaintiff had been planted and cultivated, instead of the 268 trees of a kind not ordered by plaintiff.

It is strenuously contended that the allowance of any evidence of the value of the land was material error, for which the judgment should be reversed. But since growing fruit trees are a part of the land, and probably of no value when severed from it (Montgomery v. Locke, 72 Cal. 75, 13 Pac. 401), it was proper to prove how much the different kinds of trees added to the value of the land; and the difference between the value thus added by the trees delivered and the value that would have been added if the trees ordered had been planted instead of those seems to be the measure of plaintiff's damage, according to section 3313 of the Civil Code. "It is settled in New York," says Mr. Sutherland (section 1019), "that where fruit trees are destroyed or injured, and their owner asserts his right to go beyond their value after severance from the land, so as to obtain compensation for the damage done the latter, his recovery is measured by the difference between the value of the land before and after the injury;" citing Dwight v. Railroad Co., 132 N. Y. 199, 30 N. E. 398. On the assumption that the mode of proof was not materially erroneous, the findings of fact are justified by the evidence. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PEOPLE ex rel. SCHWARTZ v. TEMPLE et al. (No. 19,346.)

VACATING JUDGMENT—TIME FOR MAKING MOTION.

1. A judgment void on its face may be set aside on motion. An inspection of the judgment roll only is permitted.

2. A judgment void for want of jurisdiction of the person of defendant, where the invalidity does not appear from the judgment roll, may be set aside on motion within a year, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that when the summons is not personally served the court may allow a defendant to answer to the merits within one year after judgment.

3. Where a party fails to move within such time to set aside the judgment, his remedy is by action making all persons interested parties thereto.

4. Where a judgment is rendered on publication of the summons the affidavit and order of publication are no part of the judgment roll, and the judgment is not void on its face, even where no affidavit or order is found among the papers, and there is no entry in the records that either was ever made.

5. In an action to vacate a land patent it appeared that the state in 1876 obtained by default a judgment annulling the interest of the relator in land for which he held a certificate of purchase; that the summons was served by publication; that a patent for the land was in 1888 issued to defendant; that in 1889 relator, on notice to the district attorney, defendant having no notice, obtained an order vacating the judgment on the ground that the court never acquired jurisdiction of his person as no affidavit or order of publication appeared in the case. Held, that the order vacating it was void.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by the people on the relation of Henry Schwartz against Frank Temple and others. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich and H. S. Foote, for appellant. E. W. Hendrick and Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent Temple. Harris & Gregg and J. P. Hight, for other respondents. Parrish, Mossholder & Lewis, for interveners.

BELCHER, C. This action was instituted for the purpose of having two state patents, one for the east half and the other for the west half of a certain sixteenth section of land in San Diego county, vacated and set aside, so far as they affect the south half of the section, upon the ground that they were issued without authority of law and were void. The court below found the facts very fully, and gave judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiffs appeal on the judgment roll, without any statement or bill of exceptions.

The facts found, so far as they need be noticed, are in substance as follows: Prior to July 28, 1865, the said section was surveyed by authority of the United States, and on that day the township plat, including the same, was on file in the proper United States land office. The whole section was then vacant and unoccupied, and it remained so until some time in the year 1883. On May 10, 1869, Henry Schwartz, the relator, who was then qualified to purchase school lands from the state, made application to purchase the south half of the section, and his application was approved by the surveyor general on July 14, 1869. Within 50 days thereafter he paid to the treasurer of San Bernardino county 20 per cent. of the purchase money, and the first year's interest on the balance, and also the sum of $3 for the issuance of the certificate of purchase, and on September 11th following a certificate of purchase in the usual form was issued to him, which he never assigned or transferred. In the application made by Schwartz and in the order approving the same the said section was described as being in San Bernardino county, and it was then and thereafter by the land department of the state and by the public authorities generally believed to be and treated as being in that county, until a survey of the county line was made in 1880 or 1881, when it was found to be in San Diego county. Schwartz paid the interest on the balance of the purchase money up to January 1, 1874, but never afterwards paid any interest, or any part of the principal. On July 8, 1876, an action in the name of the people of the state of California was commenced against him in the district court of the eighteenth judicial district in and for the county of San Bernardino to foreclose his interest in the said land, and to annul the said certificate of purchase. The action resulted in a judgment by default, entered on December 12, 1876, which recited "that the defendant has been regularly served with summons in said action according to law," and granted the relief prayed for. The judgment roll made up in the case consisted of the complaint, with a memorandum of the defendants' default indorsed thereon; the summons, and a copy thereof, with an affidavit annexed thereto stating that the affiant was one of the publishers and the principal clerk in the office of a certain daily newspaper published in the said county, and that the summons "was published in said newspaper for four weeks consecutively, to wit, daily from the 21st day of July, 1876, to the 11th day of September, 1876;" and a copy of the judgment. Twenty days after the entry of the said judgment a certified copy thereof was filed in the office of the register of the state land office. On May 5, 1883, the defendant Frank Temple made application to purchase the west half of the said section, and at that time he possessed the qualifications necessary to enable him to make the purchase. His application was in proper form, and was approved October 2, 1883. Within 50 days after the approval he made the first payment, as required by law, and subsequently made full payment, and on December 8, 1888, received a patent for the land applied for. On May 5, 1883, W. W. Averill made application to purchase the east half of said section, and he was then qualified to make the purchase. His application was in proper form, and was approved October 2, 1883. Within 50 days after the approval he made the first payment, and thereafter a certificate of purchase was issued to him, which he assigned to the defendant Thomas W. Carter, who made full payment, and on May 14, 1886, received a patent for the land so applied for. On February 4, 1889, on motion of Schwartz, an order was made by the superior court of San Bernardino county vacating and setting aside the said judgment entered against him in the district court of that county on December 12, 1876, upon the ground that the said court never acquired or had any jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, for the reason that no affidavit or order of the court was ever made for the publication of summons in the action, and no service of summons was made on the defendant, and the defendant never appeared in the action. Notice that a motion would be made to vacate the said judgment of foreclosure against Schwartz was given to the district attorney of the county, but not to any one else, and no one of the defendants in this action had any notice or knowledge of the motion, or was present at the hearing thereof in person or by counsel. On June 26, 1889, Schwartz tendered to the treasurer of San Diego county the balance due for principal and interest on his said certificate of purchase, if the same was still valid and in force; and thereafter, on July 9, 1889, this action was commenced. Other facts are found, and several questions based upon them are elaborately discussed by counsel, but the principal and controlling question in the case, and the only one which need be decided, relates to the validity and effect of the order of May 4, 1889, vacating the judgment of foreclosure; for, if that order was void, then the judgment here appealed from must be affirmed.

It is well settled that a judgment which is void upon its face, and which requires only an inspection of the judgment roll to show its invalidity, may be set aside on motion by the court rendering it at any time after its entry (People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 400, 16 Pac. 197); and also that a judgment which is in fact void for want of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, but where its invalidity does not appear from the judgment roll, may be set aside upon motion within a reasonable time after its entry (Norton v. Railroad Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, and 32 Pac. 452). Whether a judgment is void upon its face or not can only be determined by an inspection of the judgment roll, and when the service is by publication the affidavit and order for publication are no part of the roll, and cannot be considered. Estate of Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 Pac. 887; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 Pac. 220. And what is a reasonable time within which a motion may be made to set aside a judgment not void upon its face must depend somewhat upon the circumstances of each particular case, and is not definitely determined further than that it will not extend beyond the limit fixed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.[1] When a judgment is not void upon its face the court has no power to set it aside on motion, unless the motion is made within a reasonable time, but resort should be had to an action, and all the parties interested should be notified, and have an opportunity to be heard. People v. Goodhue, 80 Cal. 199, 22 Pac. 66; People v. Harrison, 84 Cal. 607, 24 Pac. 311; Moore v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 495, 25 Pac. 22; Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, 31 Pac. 899. The case in which the order now under review was made was one in which service by publication was authorized by statute (Pol. Code, § 3549), and in which, under all the decisions, state and federal, a valid judgment could be rendered upon such service. The judgment roll in the case contained all the papers constituting the judgment roll when service is by publication (section 670, Code Civ. Proc.), and they were all in proper form and sufficient. It was therefore immaterial, in the proceeding referred to, that no affidavit or order for the publication of the summons was found among the papers in the case, and that there was no entry in the records that any such affidavit or order was ever made, inasmuch as, if found, they could not have been considered. The judgment was not void upon its face, and could not upon that ground be set aside on motion. The motion was made more than 12 years after the judgment was entered, and was not within a reasonable time. The court had no power, therefore, to grant the motion, and its action in doing so must be held void and of no effect. It results that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1894.)

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich and H. S. Foote, for appellant. E. W. Hendrick and Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent Temple. Harris & Gregg and J. P. Hight, for other respondents. Parrish, Mossholder & Lewis, for interveners.

PER CURIAM. This case is in all respects the same as that of People v. Temple (No. 19,346, just decided) 37 Pac. 414, except that here the land affected is the north half instead of the south half of the section, and the application to purchase the same was made by and the certificate of purchase issued to Louis Schwartz, now deceased, of whose estate Henry Schwartz, the relator, is administrator. Upon the authority of the decision in that case the judgment here appealed from is affirmed.

ONTARIO LAND & IMP. CO. v. HOWARD.

(No. 19,336.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

A judgment for plaintiff will not be disturbed where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, with a clear preponderance in plaintiff's favor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by the Ontario Land & Improvement Company against J. S. Howard to compel defendant to pay a balance due on a contract for the sale of land, or, in default thereof, to foreclose his interest in the land. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goodcell & Leonard and E. H. Jolliffe, for appellant. Sheldon & Borden and E. M. Hanna, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. On the 9th day of June, 1887, H. L. Macneil and others, as trustees, entered into an agreement in writing with H. C. Parker, by which they agreed to sell to him, and he agreed to buy, a certain piece or parcel of land situate in Ontario, county of San Bernardino, state of California, designated as "Lot number one (1) in Canyon Ridge Tract of Ontario Colony," together with 10 shares of the capital stock of the San Antonio Water Company, for the sum of $2,500, payable in four annual installments of $625 each,—one on the execution of the agreement, and the residue in like annual installments,—with interest, etc.; said Parker to have possession, and deed to be executed, on completion of payments. Plaintiff is assignee of Macneil and others, and defendant, Howard, is assignee of Parker, and agreed to pay purchase money to plaintiff. This action was brought to obtain a decree requiring the defendant to pay a residue of such purchase money within a specified time, or, in default thereof, that his interest in the land be foreclosed. Defendant pleaded want of title in plaintiff.

At the trial it was stipulated, in substance, that a patent from the government of the United States had issued for the rancho Cucamonga, and that plaintiff held under the grantee in said patent. The only question under the stipulation, was whether or not the land agreed to be conveyed was within the exterior boundaries of the rancho Cucamonga, as defined in said patent. It was conceded that, if the tract was within the patent, plaintiff had title thereto in fee simple, and was able to convey, and had tendered a good and sufficient deed of conveyance, properly executed, to defendant, which he had refused to accept, or to pay any portion of the money due as the purchase price of the land. The cause was tried by the court, a jury having been waived, written findings filed in favor of plaintiff, upon which a judgment was entered in its favor. The appeal is by defendant, J. S. Howard, from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion on his behalf for a new trial.

The case is plain and simple. Plaintiff, by its testimony, made what may be termed a perfect case; showing, beyond a peradventure, the land to be within the exterior boundaries of the rancho Cucamonga. Defendant introduced testimony tending to show that said land was without the boundaries of the rancho. Taken together, there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, with, as I think, a clear preponderance in favor of plaintiff. Under such circumstances, there being no other question involved, it can subserve no useful purpose to analyze and discuss the testimony. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PELLISSIER v. CORKER. (No. 19,384.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1894.)

GRANT OF EASEMENT.

A deed to R., "his heirs and assigns, for the sole purpose of an alleyway, to be used in common with the owners of other property adjoining said alleyway," conveys only an easement, and dedicates the land for use as an alleyway.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by Germain Pellissier against Aurelia J. Corker for an injunction restraining defendant from obstructing an alleyway. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Westerman & Broughton and Edwin Baxter, for appellant. Moye Wicks, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action is brought for a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendant from obstructing an alleged alleyway situated between the respective lots of land of the parties. The relief prayed for was granted, and this appeal is prosecuted from such judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial. Defendant claims title in fee to the land covered by the alleged alley or way, and bases her right to obstruct the same as grantee of one Rhinehart under a certain deed made to him by one Winbigler, the original owner of the entire tract. At the date of this deed he held the title in fee to the strip in dispute, unless it had been previously dedicated. Appellant insists that the deed from Winbigler passed the title in fee to Rhinehart, and she now relies upon the Rhinehart title; and the determination as to the character of title that passed under that deed is determinative of the case. It recites: "I, David Winbigler, for value received, do hereby grant to W. V. Rhinehart, his heirs and assigns, for the sole purpose of an alleyway, to be used in common with the owners of other property adjoining said alleyway, all that tract of land," etc. We think this deed is an express grant of an easement; a right to the use, and nothing more. Section 1066 of the Civil Code declares that grants are to be interpreted in like manner with contracts in general, except so far as is otherwise provided in that article; and upon the face of this writing the intention, and the whole intention, of the parties is apparent from every line, and that intention was to dedicate the strip of land for use as an alleyway by the owners of the adjacent lots, and that the legal title should be held by Rhinehart, his heirs and assigns, in trust for that purpose, and subject to the easement created by the dedication. If we consider the situation of the parties, and the surrounding circumstances accompanying the making of the deed, this conclusion is impregnably fortified. Section 1105 of the Civil Code declares that a fee-simple title is presumed to be intended to pass upon a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended; and in this case it clearly appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended. Appellant invokes a principle laid down in section 1070—that, if several parts of a grant are irreconcilable, the former part prevails; and she now declares that this grant was to Rhinehart and his heirs and assigns; that these words conveyed an estate in fee, and that the subsequent language of the deed attempted to create limitations and reservations inconsistent and irreconcilable with the title already created. We think the principle here invoked has no application to the present case. There are no irreconcilable parts to this grant. Indeed, there is but one part to it, and that is essentially the grant for a use. Many of the cases cited by appellant hold that a prohibition of the use of property granted, inconsistent with the title conveyed, is void. A notable case to this effect is Eldridge v. See Yup Co., 17 Cal. 44. It is there held that if land be conveyed in fee simple, and the habendum clause of the deed attempts to limit the use, such attempted limitation is of no effect, as being inconsistent with the fee title. But the present case is not analogous, and presents no such conditions, for no estate in fee ever passed to the grantee. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

GAY v. DARE et al. (No. 19,322.)

CONTRACT—ACTION FOR BREACH—DAMAGES.

Plaintiff bought stock of a national bank under an agreement with defendant that, at the end of a year, he would take it back, and repay plaintiff the price and interest. Plaintiff gave notice, and, at the end of the year, tendered the stock. Between the notice and the tender the bank became insolvent. After the tender the comptroller of currency levied an assessment on the stock which plaintiff had to pay. Held, in an action for breach of contract, that plaintiff could recover, not only the purchase price and interest, but also the amount of the assessment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by John H. Gay, Jr., against D. D. Dare and S. G. Havermale, to recover damages for breach of contract. A demurrer to the supplemental complaint was interposed by defendant S. G. Havermale. The same was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for appellant. C. L. Barber and Wellborn, Stevens & Wellborn, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. The California National Bank of San Diego was a national banking corporation, organized under the laws of the United States, and having its place of business at San Diego, Cal. On the 20th day of January, 1891, plaintiff subscribed for 100 shares of the capital stock of said corporation, and paid therefor the sum of $12,500. In consideration of plaintiff's subscribing for and payment of said sum of money for said stock, the defendants herein jointly and severally agreed with him, in writing, that, in the event of said plaintiff "wishing to sell the said stock at the end of one year from the date of issue, we [the defendants] will take said stock at the price paid for it, and allow the said John H. Gay, Jr. [plaintiff], ten per cent. on the investment of $12,500 for the time said money was invested. Interest payable from the time the money is paid in. Said John H. Gay, Jr., agrees to give the undersigned four months' notice of his desire to dispose of said stock. [Signed] D. D. Dare. S. G. Havermale. J. W. Collins." On the 15th day of September, 1891, plaintiff, wishing to sell said stock in pursuance of the terms of said agreement, gave to the defendants notice of his desire to dispose of said stock to them, pursuant to the terms of said agreement; and four months thereafter, on, to wit, January 20, 1892, plaintiff offered to return said stock to defendants, and demanded of them performance of said agreement, and that they take and pay him for said stock said sum of $12,500, and interest from January 20, 1891, at 10 per cent. per annum, which defendants refused to do. After plaintiff gave the defendants the four months' notice of his desire to sell the stock to them, but before the tender thereof and demand, as above stated, viz. on the 12th day of November, 1891, the California National Bank of San Diego, aforesaid, became and was and ever since has been insolvent. Plaintiff thereafter brought this action to recover the $12,500 and interest, tendered and deposited in court the stock, etc. Defendant Dare was absent from the United States, and was not served with process. Defendant Collins was served with summons, made default, and thereafter died. Defendant Havermale answered. Subsequent thereto, the comptroller of the currency of the United States, on the 15th day of May, 1892, levied an assessment upon the stock of the insolvent bank to pay its debts, which amounted to $10,000 upon the 100 shares held by plaintiff, which sum he was compelled to pay, and did pay, to the receiver of the bank. Thereafter plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint, setting out the levy of said assessment and the payment thereof by him, and sought to recover the same from defendants, in addition to the sum of $12,500 and interest. Defendant Havermale demurred to the supplemental complaint, which demurrer was sustained by the court; and at the trial plaintiff had judgment for $12,500 and interest, but it was adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing in the cause of action set out in his supplemental complaint. Plaintiff appeals from so much of the judgment as adjudged that he take nothing by reason of the facts set forth in his supplemental complaint on file in said action. The case comes up on the judgment roll, without a statement or bill of exceptions.

It is quite apparent from the agreement that the true intent of the parties to it was that if the plaintiff, at the end of one year from the date of the purchase, desired it, the defendants would repurchase the stock, and repay his money, with interest at 10 per cent. The practical effect of this was to treat the sum paid by plaintiff as an investment, upon which he was to have interest, if he so desired, and gave the four months' notice prescribed in the agreement. This he did, as he had a right under the agreement to do, four months before the expiration of the year. The contention of respondents that plaintiff's notice was premature cannot be maintained. The agreement of defendants was to take the stock at the end of one year, if plaintiff desired to sell it. This he could do four months before the expiration of the year. The duty of defendants under their agreement was to take and pay for the stock when, after the four months' notice, it was, on the 20th day of January, 1892, tendered to them, and payment demanded. Not having done so, the question is, can plaintiff recover as damages the assessment which was thereafter, and on the 5th day of May, 1892, levied upon said stock, and which he was compelled under the statutes of the United States to pay and did pay? "For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which in the ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom." Civ. Code, § 3300. The vendor of personal property, in a suit against the vendee for not taking and paying for the property, has the choice ordinarily of either one of three methods to indemnify himself: "(1) He may store or retain the property for the vendee, and sue him for the entire purchase price. (2) He may sell the property, acting as the agent for this purpose of the vendee, and recover the difference between the contract price and the price obtained on such re-sale. (3) He may keep the property as his own, and recover the difference between the market price at the time and place of delivery and the contract price." Dustan v. McAndrew, 44 N. Y. 72; Dwiggins v. Clark, 94 Ind. 49; Sedg. Dam. (8th Ed.) § 753. The plaintiff here adopted the first of the methods above set forth, and retained the property for the vendees until suit was brought, when he deposited it in court for their benefit. This he had a right to do. Indeed, in all that class of cases where a purchaser of chattels pays the price, but stipulates that, after a trial of the property purchased, or at some future time, he may, if he so desires, return the property, and receive back the price paid, it is usually held that it does not amount in law to a contract to repurchase, but is, upon the exercise of the option, a rescission of the contract, and the title at once vests in the original vendor. Laubach v. Laubach, 73 Pa. St. 387; Thorndike v. Locke, 98 Mass. 340. Be this as it may, it was the duty of the defendants on the 20th day of January, 1892, to receive the stock and repay plaintiff his money, with interest, which they refused to do. One of the results of such refusal was that plaintiff was compelled to pay an assessment of $10,000, subsequently levied upon the stock. Upon a tender by plaintiff and refusal to accept and pay by the defendants, the former held the stock as the trustee for defendants; and, as such trustee, he was entitled to all necessary expenses for which he became liable and paid by virtue of his position. The assessment was a consequential damage, it is true, which arose from the stock standing in the name of plaintiff; but it was a consequence of the refusal of the defendants to take the stock at the time they had agreed to do, and it was a proximate result of their refusal. The vendor of chattels, in cases where the vendee refuses to accept and pay for them pursuant to agreement, and who thereafter holds them as the agent or trustee of the vendee, not only may, but must, at his peril, take care of and protect the property for his principal or beneficiary, and is entitled to compensation therefor as damages consequential of the breach of the contract. This doctrine has been applied to the storage of grain and other personal property, to the feed and care of animals, and to various other expenses incident to the nature, character, and condition of the property. McCracken v. Webb, 36 Iowa, 551. In such cases the loss is the natural result of the breach of the contract, and is so near in its casual sequence to the injury or wrong that the law takes it in the account in its estimate of what is just compensation. Spelling on Private Corporations, at section 501, says: "After a call has been made, the corporation has a cause of action against the shareholder at the time of making it; and this cause of action cannot be extinguished except by its consent. But between the immediate parties the transferrer has recourse against his immediate transferee for such calls and assessments as he has been compelled to pay pending registration,"—citing Castellan v. Hobson, L. R. 10 Eq. Cas. 47. The case cited fully sustains the doctrine enunciated in the text. Were the rule otherwise, one who contracts for the purchase of stock in a corporation to be delivered in the future, upon which he is certain assessments will be levied, may, by violating his contract to receive the stock, devolve upon the vendor the necessity of paying the assessment, and then, if the stock has not been sold, tender payment and demand his stock; or where payment has been made, and the stock delivered, he may, by neglecting his manifest duty to have a transfer made upon the books of the corporation, compel the transferrer to pay future assessments. Such is not the law. One who contracts to purchase stock on a given date must take it at the time indicated in his contract cum onere; and, if he fails to do so, he is liable, not only for the purchase price and interest, but for all assessments levied upon the stock after his breach of the contract which his vendor is compelled to pay thereon. It follows that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the supplemental complaint, and that portion of the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer of defendant Havermale to the supplemental complaint, with leave to answer, and that the issues tendered by such supplemental complaint be tried on the merits.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, so much of the judgment of the court below as is appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer of defendant Havermale to the supplemental complaint, with leave to said Havermale to answer, and that the issues tendered by such supplemental complaint be tried on the merits.

Ex parte MURPHY. (No. 21,146.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1894.)

HABEAS CORPUS—RETURN — EXPIRATION OF SENTENCE—ESCAPES.

When in habeas corpus the sheriff returns that he holds the prisoner by virtue of a commitment to the house of correction for three years, and the commitment bears a date more than three years old, the court cannot consider an unauthenticated statement of dates when the prisoner escaped and was recaptured, and of the date when his term will end, the same being pinned to the sheriff's return, as proof that the prisoner has not in fact served his term.

In bank.

Habeas corpus ex parte Thomas Murphy. Petitioner discharged.

G. E. Colwell, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner was convicted of grand larceny, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, March 1, 1889, and on March 9, 1889, was sentenced to be confined in the house of correction of said city and county for the term of three years. Upon his petition and averment that he is illegally restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of said city and county, a writ of habeas corpus was issued out of this court, directed to said sheriff, and to the said writ the sheriff made return that he holds the petitioner by virtue of a commitment issued under the aforesaid judgment, said commitment consisting of a certified copy of the judgment. As the commitment bears date March 9, 1889, it appears upon its face that the period of confinement for which the petitioner was sentenced has expired, and, as the sheriff presents no other authority for restraining him of his liberty, it follows that he is entitled to be discharged. It was suggested at the first hearing of the matter that the petitioner had in the meantime escaped from the house of correction, and that he had not in fact been confined for the full period of his sentence. Thereupon leave was given to the sheriff to amend his return, for the purpose of showing these facts, but he has failed to make such showing, and again returns that he holds him by virtue of the original commitment. There is attached, by a pin, to the amended return filed by the sheriff, what purports to be a list of dates at which the petitioner escaped, and was recaptured, and the statement of the time when his term of confinement will expire. This list or statement is signed "Chas. Gildea, Supt.," but is not authenticated in any other mode, nor is it in any way referred to by the sheriff, and cannot be considered as giving to that officer any authority to retain the petitioner in his custody. The petitioner is discharged.

CLUGSTON v. GARRETSON. (No. 19,313.)

SLANDER — WORDS ACTIONABLE PER SE — CHARGING ARSON.

It is actionable per se to charge one with setting fire to a wood yard in which is located a warehouse, as such act is arson, under Pen. Code, §§ 447, 448.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by B. D. Clugston against G. G. Garretson to recover damages for slander. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Conklin & Hughes and V. E. Shaw, for appellant. Works & Works and D. L. Withington, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff in consequence of defamatory words spoken by defendant of and concerning the plaintiff. The following is a copy of the complaint: "(1) That on the 7th day of March, 1893, a warehouse in a yard owned by the Pacific Wood and Coal Company was set on fire, and it was suspected that it had been feloniously set on fire. (2) That on the 7th day of March, 1893, at San Diego, the defendant, in the hearing of C. K. Stewart and sundry other persons, spoke of and concerning the plaintiff the false and scandalous words following, to wit: 'Clugston set fire to the yard; set fire all along here.' And that upon the 8th day of March, 1893, in the presence of Thomas Croghan and sundry other persons, the said defendant spoke of and concerning the plaintiff the false and scandalous words following: 'Clugston made a good job of it. Clugston set the yard afire. He was seen going out of the yard ten or fifteen minutes before the fire broke out.' And upon the 8th day of March, 1893, in the presence of Herman Mosher and sundry other persons, the said defendant spoke of and concerning the plaintiff the false and scandalous words following, to wit, 'Clugston set the fire.' (3) That the defendant meant thereby, and was so understood by those hearing him, that the plaintiff had feloniously set fire to said yard. (4) That the said words were false and defamatory. That the plaintiff has sustained damage by reason of said false and scandalous words in the sum of twenty thousand dollars. Wherefore the plaintiff prays judgment against the defendant in the sum of twenty thousand dollars." Defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground "that it does not state a cause of action." The demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered as follows: "Comes now the defendant, and by leave of court files this, his amended answer, and admits the allegations of paragraphs 1 and 3 of said complaint; admits that he spoke concerning the plaintiff the words alleged in paragraph 2 of said complaint to have been spoken by him. But denies that said words, or any of them, were either false, scandalous or defamatory; on the contrary, this defendant, upon information and belief, alleges that each and all of said words charged to have been spoken by him are true. Defendant denies that plaintiff has sustained damage by reason of said words used by defendant, or any of them, in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, or any other sum. And, further answering, defendant avers: That at the time at which said words were spoken by him certain litigation was pending between plaintiff and this defendant, with others, over an election of a board of directors of the Pacific Wood and Coal Company, and involving the right to possession and control of the said yard, and this defendant, with his associates, had acquired possession and control of said yard, and was in possession at the time of said fire, to wit, March 7, 1893; that by reason of this, defendant and his associates being in control and possession of said yard, and by reason of defendant and others then in possession of said yard preventing said Clugston from gaining control and possession thereof, and carrying on the wood and coal business in the name of said Pacific Wood and Coal Company, he, the said Clugston, became greatly angered and exasperated, and made numerous threats of doing bodily harm to this defendant and others in control of said yard as well as the management of the business of said company, and at divers times expressed himself, in substance, 'that he would rather see the property destroyed than be in the possession and control of defendant and his associates,' all of which was known to this defendant at the time he spoke the words set forth in paragraph 2 of said complaint." The jury returned a general verdict for plaintiff, assessing the damage at $800; and also a special verdict on issues submitted by the court to the effect: (1) That at the times the words were spoken, and at the time the answer was filed, the defendant believed the words spoken were true, and that facts known to defendant and information given to him warranted such belief; (2) that defendant was not guilty of actual or express malice, and that nothing was found or allowed as exemplary damages; (3) that before filing his amended answer the defendant endeavored in good faith to ascertain whether the charge made by him against the plaintiff was true; (4) but that the words spoken were false. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff in accordance with the general verdict, and defendant brings this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll containing a bill of exceptions to instructions given to the jury at request of the plaintiff.

1. It is contended that the court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer for the reason that the words alleged to have been spoken by defendant are not per se actionable. It is claimed that the words spoken charge plaintiff with having set on fire only the yard in which the warehouse stood, and that setting fire to a yard is not arson nor any other crime. This, I think, is erroneous in two respects: In the first place, the yard in which the warehouse is alleged to have been set on fire should be regarded prima facie as "appurtenant to or connected with" the warehouse, and therefore within the definition of the word "building" given in section 448 of the Penal Code; and the yard being so appurtenant to or connected with the warehouse, the setting of it on fire was arson. Pen. Code, §§ 447, 448. In the second place, it is alleged that "a warehouse in a yard * * * was set on fire," and that on March 8th, in the presence of Mosher and others, defendant said, "Clugston set the fire." Under the circumstances alleged, these words obviously meant that Clugston set fire to the warehouse, and must have been so understood by Mosher and others to whom they were spoken; and no innuendo was necessary to show the meaning. That he had said to others on March 7th that "Clugston set fire to the yard all along here," and "made a good job of it," is not inconsistent with what he said to Mosher and others on the next day. It was not necessary to allege that the warehouse was consumed or destroyed by the fire. Pen. Code, § 451. If distinct causes of action are not separately stated, or not stated with sufficient certainty, these defects were waived. Code Civ. Proc. § 434. As having a general bearing on the question of sufficiency of the complaint, the following cases are referred to: Chamberlain v. Vance, 51 Cal. 75; Fleming v. Albeck, 67 Cal. 226, 7 Pac. 659; Thompson v. Barkley, 27 Pa. St. 263. I think the complaint is sufficient to stand the test of a general demurrer.

2. The only ground of objection to instructions given to the jury is that they assume that the words admitted to have been spoken under the circumstances alleged in the complaint and answer imputed to plaintiff the crime of arson. As above shown, the words alleged to have been spoken are actionable per se. The answer expressly admits the speaking of the words under the circumstances alleged in the complaint, and alleges no circumstance tending to show that they were spoken, or intended to be understood, in any other than their proper and ordinary sense; but does allege circumstances in mitigation, tending to show that defendant had reason to believe that plaintiff did set fire to the property, and a motive for imputing the crime to him. The first two instructions given embody and sufficiently exemplify the only ground of objection to instructions. They are as follows: "This is an action for slander for words alleged to have been spoken by the defendant, charging the plaintiff with the crime of arson. The defendant admits the speaking of the words, but alleges that the words spoken were true, and sets up certain mitigating circumstances." "Under these pleadings no proof was necessary on the part of plaintiff to make out his case. The defendant having admitted the speaking of the words, the law presumes that the words were both false and malicious. Therefore the burden of proving the truth of the words or any facts tending to mitigate the damages was on the defendant." At request of defendant the court, among others, gave the following instructions: "If the jury do not find the plea of justification to be true, but do find the defendant guilty, then the jury, in estimating the amount of plaintiff's damages, may take into consideration any facts proven tending to show whether or not the utterance of the words complained of was made by the defendant in the belief that they were true. Though the jury may believe from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of speaking the words charged in the complaint, and that said words are untrue, still, if the jury find from the evidence that the words were spoken without actual malice on the part of defendant, but in good faith believing them to be true, then, and in that case, the verdict of the jury should be confined to the actual damages sustained by plaintiff." I think the jury were properly instructed, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

MODOC COUNTY v. SPENCER et al. (No. 18,291.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1894.)

COUNTIES—EMPLOYING COUNSEL IN CRIMINAL CASES.

1. Neither under County Government Act, § 25, subd. 17, empowering the board of supervisors to direct the management of suits to which the county is a party, and to employ counsel to assist the district attorney therein, nor under Id. subd. 36, empowering it to authorize the district attorney to appoint an assistant, if need be, nor under any inherent general power undefined by statute, has the board power to employ counsel to assist in the prosecution of criminal cases.

2. In a suit by a county through its district attorney to restrain the treasurer from paying a warrant the payee of the warrant is a proper party defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; C. L. Claflin, Judge.

Suit by the county of Modoc against Spencer & Raker and others for injunction. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Spencer & Raker and Clarence A. Raker, for appellants. G. D. Goodwin, E. E. Copeland, and Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The substantive question in this case is as to the power of a board of supervisors to employ counsel on behalf of the county to prosecute or assist in the prosecution of criminal cases. The board of supervisors of Modoc county, on the 7th day of July, 1891, adopted an order or resolution in the following terms: "Upon motion, and with full consent of the board, it is ordered that the firm of Spencer & Raker be, and are hereby, employed and appointed as assistant counsel with the district attorney to aid in the prosecution of all criminal cases now pending before the superior court of Modoc county, at the agreed sum of $600 as full compensation for all services." And thereafter, on the 9th day of October, 1891, as a sequence of the foregoing, adopted a further order or resolution, of which the following is a copy: "On motion of Supervisor Wylie, seconded by Supervisor Cannon, it is ordered that the auditor be instructed to draw a warrant on the treasurer for three hundred dollars, as part payment for legal services rendered by Spencer & Raker for the county, in conformity with a previous order of the board of supervisors made, employing the said Spencer & Raker to assist the district attorney in the prosecution of criminal cases pending in the superior court of Modoc county, California, against Denis O'Brien and T. B. Reese." In pursuance of this last-recited order the auditor drew his warrant in favor of said Spencer & Raker as therein directed, and this action is brought by the county, through its district attorney, to restrain the treasurer from paying it. Judgment went in favor of the county, from which defendants appeal. If the board had no power to employ counsel for the purposes indicated, the judgment is right; otherwise not. We can find no authority in the law to sustain the action of the supervisors in the premises. Boards of supervisors are creatures of the statute, the constitution (article 22, § 5) providing that the legislature shall provide for their election or appointment, and prescribe their duties. The authority for any act must, therefore, be sought in the statute. The only provisions looking to such power as was here attempted to be exercised which have been called to our attention are found in section 25 of the county government act (St. 1891, pp. 304–307), which takes the place of the provisions of the Political Code on the subject. Subdivision 17 of that section gives the board power "to direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party, and to employ counsel to assist the district attorney in conducting the same." Subdivision 36 of the same section gives it power "to authorize the district attorney to appoint an assistant district attorney, if in their judgment it may be necessary, for the proper discharge of the duties of the district attorney, and to allow such assistant district attorney such compensation for his services as they may determine, not to exceed, unless otherwise in this act provided, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum." It cannot be successfully contended that the first of these provisions gives any warrant for the action of the board in this case. That provision is evidently intended to empower the supervisors to protect the rights of the county in any litigation it may have involving its property or other substantial rights. The power is in terms restricted to suits "to which the county is a party," and while possibly, in a proper case, it might be construed to include actions or proceedings in which the county, while not nominally a party, nevertheless has a direct, substantial interest or right of property involved, it can have no application to the character of cases referred to in the orders of the board in question. The county was in no sense a party to those cases, nor had it any rights litigated therein. They were criminal cases, prosecuted in the name and on behalf of the people of the state. They involved no interest of the county in any sense other than such interest as the county had in common with every other county and all the people of the state in upholding the administration of the law. The fact that the county, as an instrument of the law, pays the expense of criminal prosecutions, confers no such right or interest as that contemplated by the act. It is equally apparent that subdivision 36 has no application to the facts. That provision contemplates the appointment by the district attorney, under authorization of the supervisors, of an assistant district attorney, who takes an official oath as an officer of the county, and under the authority, direction, and control of his principal assists in the performance of any and all duties pertaining to the office. It does not contemplate the employment by the supervisors of special counsel, who may or may not be acceptable to the district attorney, to take part in particular cases. There is no sort of analogy between the purpose of subdivision 36 and that aimed at in the proceedings of the board in this instance, and the suggestion that the action of the board may be upheld as a substantial compliance with that provision is without weight. In fact, it does not seem to be very seriously contended that either of these provisions warranted the act of the board, but it is strongly urged, in effect, that it was within the inherent, general power of the board, in the absence of special provision, to provide for the proper prosecution of these cases. But we know of no such inherent or undefined power in the board of supervisors. Their powers being purely statutory, their every act must find its warrant in the statute, either expressly or by necessary implication. Robinson v. Supervisors, 16 Cal. 208; San Joaquin Co. v. Jones, 18 Cal. 327; Foster v. Coleman, 10 Cal. 279; Linden v. Case, 46 Cal. 171. The legislature having specified certain cases in which such power may be exercised, there is no implication that she intended it to be exercised in others. "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." In fact an examination of all the provisions of the statutes bearing upon the subject leads to the conclusion that it never was intended that the board of supervisors should be permitted to control or interfere with criminal prosecutions or with the district attorney in their management. The district attorney, in the discharge of the duties of his office, performs two quite distinct functions. He is at once the law officer of the county and the public prosecutor. While, in the former capacity, he represents the county, and is largely subordinate to and under the control of the board of supervisors, he is not so in the latter. In the prosecution of criminal cases he acts by the authority and in the name of the people of the state. Const. art. 6, § 20; County Government Act, § 136. If he fails for any reason to appear at the trial in a criminal case for the discharge of his duty, the court is authorized to designate some competent attorney to take his place for the occasion (Pen. Code, § 1130); and if at any time it is deemed essential for the public service that he have assistance in this behalf it is made the duty of the attorney general to go to his aid (Pol. Code, § 470, subd. 7). It is said that what was done here has been frequently done by boards of supervisors in other counties. We are not disposed to question this assertion, nor the perfect good faith of the board in this instance. Many acts done by boards and officers in the supposed discharge of their duty and in the best of faith do not find sanction in the law, and for a time pass current because unchallenged; but that fact cannot weigh in favor of their validity when eventually called into question. The action of the board, being without authority, was void, and created no legal claim against the county. "It is settled in this state that no order made by a board of supervisors is valid or binding unless it is authorized by law. No claim against a county can be allowed, unless it be legally chargeable to the county; and, if claims not legally chargeable to the county are allowed, neither the allowance nor the warrants drawn therefor create any legal liability." Linden v. Case, supra.

The other questions, as we have indicated, do not demand extended notice. The demurrers were properly overruled. The complaint stated a cause of action, and, while Spencer & Raker were perhaps not necessary parties, they were nevertheless proper ones. The answer did not contain any defense to the action, and the court did not err in its disposition of it. Nor was there any substantial error in the manner of entering judgment; it was in effect a judgment on the pleadings. Judgment affirmed.

EMINENT DOMAIN—RIGHTS OF IRRIGATION COMPANY—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. Laws 1887, p. 29, authorized plaintiff to construct waterworks for irrigation, and section 12 gave it power to acquire property "necessary for the construction, use, supply, maintenance, repair, and improvement of said canal or canals and works * * * and all necessary appurtenances." Held to authorize taking land for constructing a pipe line.

2. The complaint alleged that, in order to properly irrigate the lands in the district, it was necessary to construct a pipe line across defendant's land, which adjoins the district. Held sufficient to show the use a public one, and the taking necessary.

3. It was proper to admit the decree of the superior court confirming the proceedings for plaintiff's organization to establish the facts therein stated.

4. It was not necessary to show there was no other way than the one designated by which the water could be brought.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. Rowell, Judge.

Action by the Rialto Irrigating District against J. R. Brandon and others to condemn a right of way for a pipe line over defendants' land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph R. Brandon, for appellants. Walter Bordwell, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Plaintiff is an irrigation district formed under the law of 1887 (St. 1887, p. 29), commonly known as the "Wright Act," having its location in San Bernardino county. In constructing its works for the purpose of supplying water for irrigation purposes to the inhabitants of the district, it was found necessary, to complete a proper irrigation system, to lay a certain pipe line, described in the complaint, across lands belonging to the defendants. This action was brought for the purpose of condemning a right of way for such pipe line. Judgment went for plaintiff, condemning the necessary way, and assessing damages for the taking in favor of defendants, with costs. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. The appeal is without merit.

1. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The objection that power is not given under the act to condemn property for the purposes sought is untenable. The argument is that the act provides only for the construction of ditches and canals, and that this does not include pipe lines. The act provides for the construction of a "system of works" to irrigate the lands within the district, and by section 12 the board is given the right to acquire property "necessary for the construction, use, supply, maintenance, repair, and improvement of said canal or canals and works * * * and all necessary appurtenances." This language is broad enough to include pipe lines, flumes, or other conduits usually employed in works of the kind for conveying water, even if not necessarily included in the terms "ditches and canals." The complaint, after alleging plaintiff's organization into an irrigation district, and the purpose of its organization, shows that the object sought by the use is to provide water for irrigating lands within the district, particularly describing such lands; that the defendants own the land over which the right of way is sought, particularly describing it, and that such land adjoins plaintiff's district, and constitutes its boundaries on two sides,—the north and west; that, in order to properly irrigate the lands in the district, it is necessary to construct the pipe line (which is particularly described) across the defendants' land at the point designated; and that the right of way is sought for the purposes of establishing and maintaining such pipe line. The complaint is also accompanied by proper maps, which are made part of it, showing survey and delineation of the proposed line upon the ground. This was sufficient to show that the use is a public one, and that the taking is necessary to such use. Cummings v. Peters, 56 Cal. 596. There is nothing in the further point urged against the complaint. The rule there contended for is not a rule of pleading, but of evidence.

2. It was not error to admit the decree of the superior court confirming the regularity of the proceedings for plaintiff's organization as an irrigation district to establish the facts therein decreed. The proceeding in which that decree was rendered was a proceeding in rem, had and authorized for the express purpose of fixing the legal status of the corporation, and that decree concluded the whole world upon all the questions involved. Crall v. Irrigation Dist., 87 Cal. 140, 26 Pac. 797.

3. The evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding that the right of way was a public use, and a necessity. It was not necessary for plaintiff to show that there was absolutely no other way but the one designated in its complaint by which the water could be brought on its land. The fact that it might have been possible, as shown by the evidence, by going a long way around, and condemning other lands, at a much greater expense, to accomplish the purpose sought, is immaterial. We have examined the various other assignments, and do not regard them as requiring special mention. We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re YOAKAM'S ESTATE. (No. 19,383.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1894.)

NEW TRIAL—NOTICE OF MOTION—SPECIFICATIONS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 4, providing that when the motion for new trial is to be made on the minutes, for insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, the notice must specify the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient, does not require said notice to be more specific than so as clearly to show the court and adversary the points relied on.

2. Where the record does not state the evidence given at the trial, the supreme court may presume that it authorized the court to order a new trial, under Code Civ. Proc. § 662, of its own motion, for manifest passion or prejudice.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Emily R. Yoakam, deceased, on contest as to undue influence used in procuring execution of will. Trial by jury, and verdict for contestant. New trial granted, and contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence A. Miller, for appellant. McLachlan & York, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. Emily R. Yoakam died in the county of Los Angeles, leaving an alleged last will which was dated March 4, 1893. The respondents filed in the court below the said will, and their petition asking that the same be admitted to probate. In due time the appellant appeared and contested the probate thereof, upon the grounds, among others, that its execution was procured by the undue influence of certain persons, none of whom were named therein as legatees or executors. A general denial of all the allegations contained in the written grounds of opposition was filed by respondents. By agreement, the issue as to the alleged undue influence in procuring the execution of the will was submitted to a jury, and by their verdict the jury found in favor of appellant on that issue. Subsequently, on motion of respondents, the court made and entered its order granting a new trial of the contest, and from that order this appeal is prosecuted. The notice of the motion for a new trial stated that the motion would be made upon the minutes of the court, and upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. Appellant contends—and this is the only point made for a reversal—that the notice did "not properly or at all specify the particulars in which the evidence was alleged to be insufficient, as required by subdivision 4 of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the motion should therefore have been denied." The specifications contained in the notice are as follows: "The evidence was insufficient to justify said verdict, in this: The evidence showed that the said alleged will was signed by the testatrix, in the presence of the subscribing witnesses thereto, on the 4th day of March, 1893, and that she at that time requested said subscribing witnesses to sign the same as witnesses, and that they signed the same on that day, as such witnesses, at her request, and in her presence; that the said decedent, at the time of the signing of the said alleged will, declared the same to be her will, and that she was at that time, and always, of sound mind, and competent to make a will, and that she was not at that time, or ever, under undue influence or influenced by fraud; that there was no undue influence, or any influence, exerted at that time, or ever, over decedent, in the making of said alleged will, or with reference thereto, by Dr. Hodge, Henrietta Davis, Minda Davis, D. W. Davis, or either of them, or by any one, and that the evidence shows that the said alleged will provides for an equitable distribution of the estate of the decedent among the proper subjects of her bounty, and is fair and just in its provisions."

The object of the specifications required by the statute is clearly to direct the attention of the court and adverse party to the particular point on which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient, and when this object is accomplished they will be held sufficient. McCullough v. Clark, 41 Cal. 298; Eddelbuttel v. Durrell, 55 Cal. 279; Newell v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 242. The specifications complained of are in substance not unlike those approved in Harnett v. Railroad Co., 77 Cal. 32, 20 Pac. 154; and, as said in that case, "it would be difficult to state in more specific terms the particular points of insufficiency on which the moving party proposed to rely in its proceeding for a new trial." In our opinion, therefore, they must be held sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute. Besides, the record contains no statement of any of the evidence given at the trial, and, so far as we can know, it may have been such as would have authorized the court, under the provisions of section 662, Code Civ. Proc.,[1] to grant a new trial on its own motion, without any application therefor. But the rule is well settled that all intendments are in favor of the regularity of the action of the court below, and that error will never be presumed, but must affirmatively appear in the record. We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

BANK OF SAN LUIS OBISPO v. PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO. (No. 19,363.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 22, 1894.)

CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 359, requiring actions to enforce a liability against stockholders of a corporation to be brought within three years after the liability is created, an action to enforce the liability on a note of a corporation must be brought within three years of its date.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by the Bank of San Luis Obispo against the Pacific Coast Steamship Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant appealed. Reversed.

Wilcoxon & Bouldin and J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellant. Graves & Graves, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This action was commenced on the 3d day of June, 1890, to recover from the defendant, as a stockholder in the San Luis Hotel Company, a corporation, its proportion of an indebtedness alleged to be due from said hotel company to the plaintiff. It is averred in the complaint that at all the times mentioned therein the capital stock of the San Luis Hotel Company was $75,000, divided into 750 shares of the par value of $100 each, and that the defendant was the owner of 92.14 shares of the said stock; "that on the 30th day of December, 1886, said corporation, the San Luis Hotel Company, borrowed from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff loaned and advanced to it, said San Luis Hotel Company, the sum of $29,177.66, and on said day the said San Luis Hotel Company gave its promissory note to the plaintiff for said sum of $29,177.66, which note is in the words and figures following, to wit" (then setting out a copy of the note, dated December 30, 1886, and payable six months after date). It is further averred that on or about the 11th day of April, 1890, an action was commenced against the said hotel company to recover the amount due on said note for principal, interest, attorney's fees, and costs, and that, on or about the 30th day of the same month, judgment was duly made and given in said action against the defendant therein, and in favor of the plaintiff herein, for the sum of $8,237.93; that afterwards an execution was issued upon the said judgment, and returned wholly unsatisfied, and that the proportion of said indebtedness for which the defendant was individually and personally liable was $2,105.07, with interest thereon from the date of said judgment; and that no part thereof had been paid. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 338, and by the provisions of section 359, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant then answered, and, among other defenses set up, pleaded in bar of the action the same provisions of the Code. The case was tried, and the court found, among other things, that the action was not barred, and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the sum of $1,251.63, with costs. Judgment was accordingly so entered, from which the defendant appeals.

The demurrer should have been sustained. The action was commenced more than three years and five months after the date of the note set out. The cause of action appeared, therefore, on the face of the complaint, to be barred by the statute of limitations. It must now be regarded as settled law in this state that the liability of a stockholder of a corporation to pay his proportion of its corporate debts is one created by statute, and an action to enforce that liability must be brought within three years after the cause of action accrues. Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 Pac. 670; Hyman v. Coleman, 82 Cal. 650, 23 Pac. 62; Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335. In the case last named, it was held that the liability of a stockholder of a corporation upon a note given by the corporation is created, within the meaning of section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure, at least as early as the date of the note; and the statute of limitations commences to run in favor of the stockholder from the date of its execution, and not from its maturity, regardless of how long the liability of the corporation to actions may be postponed by agreement of the creditor. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ULLRICH v. SANTA ROSA NAT. BANK.

(No. 15,624.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 20, 1894.)

PARTIES—PRESUMPTIONS ON APPEAL.

1. In an action to recover money deposited by plaintiff with defendant under an agreement that it is to be paid to a third person on condition that the latter deliver a deed to plaintiff within a certain time, such person is not a necessary party.

2. Where, on appeal, the record does not contain the evidence, and findings of fact were waived, it will be presumed that the allegations of the complaint were proven, and that the affirmative allegations in the answer were not.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

Action by one Ullrich against the Santa Rosa National Bank. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Swain and J. A. Barham, for appellant. Albert G. Burnett and J. M. Thompson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 9th of December, 1892, the plaintiff deposited with the defendant the sum of $750, and that at the same time it was agreed between him and one Hattie C. Brown that she would, within three weeks from that time, "furnish" the plaintiff with a deed of conveyance of certain land in Sonoma county, and that thereupon the defendant should pay her the money so deposited, and that if she should fail to so furnish the deed the defendant should return the money to the plaintiff; that said money was accepted by the defendant upon and subject to this condition and agreement; that Mrs. Brown has entirely failed to furnish the deed; that on the 26th of September, 1893, the plaintiff demanded of the defendant the return of the money, which was refused; and that the defendant, at the time of such demand, knew that Mrs. Brown had failed to furnish the deed. Judgment was asked against the defendant for the amount so deposited with it. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that there was a defect of parties defendant, in that Mrs. Brown was a necessary party to the suit. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant answered the complaint, denying all its allegations, and setting up certain affirmative matters of defense. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Findings of fact were waived, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, as prayed in his complaint. The defendant has appealed from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions.

1. The demurrer was properly overruled. The complaint does not show that Mrs. Brown was in any way interested in the matter in litigation, or that her presence was necessary to a determination of the rights of the plaintiff and defendant to the money in controversy. The allegations of the complaint are to the effect that the money had been received by the defendant from the plaintiff upon the condition and agreement that, if Mrs. Brown did not furnish to the plaintiff a certain deed within three weeks from the date of the deposit, the money was to be returned to the plaintiff, and that she had not furnished such deed. This is but the ordinary averment of an agreement for the payment of money upon the happening of an event, and that the event had happened. If these averments are true, the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for the money.

2. If there were any facts, not appearing upon the face of the complaint, which would render Mrs. Brown a necessary party, whose presence was essential to the determination of the controversy, those facts could have been presented by the defendant in its answer; and the court would thereupon, upon its motion, have ordered her to be brought in as a defendant. Code Civ. Proc. § 389. So, too, if Mrs. Brown had set up any claim to the money held by the defendant, the defendant could have alleged that fact in its answer; and if it could have shown the facts required by section 386, Code Civ. Proc., it could, under the provisions of that section, have had her substituted as a defendant in its place, and procured a discharge from any liability for the money. Defendant did not, however, pursue either of these courses, but chose to defend its right to retain the money by a mere traverse of the allegations of the complaint.

3. As the record does not contain any of the evidence at the trial, and as findings of fact were waived, we must assume, in support of the judgment, that the allegations of the complaint were sustained by the proofs, and that the affirmative allegations of the answer were not so sustained. The judgment is affirmed.

ESREY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 15,440.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1894.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES — INJURIES TO PERSON ON TRACK — PROXIMATE CAUSE — FINDING — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — WILLFUL NEGLIGENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. Plaintiff negligently went between defendant's railroad track and a high platform in front of moving flat cars. The track and platform were about three feet apart, and she stood in the space between them while one or more cars passed her, and was seen by the brakemen. A box car, wider than the flat cars, was then attached, and moved in the opposite direction until it struck plaintiff. Held, that the facts justified a finding for plaintiff.

2. It appeared that after plaintiff was struck she threw herself on the ground, to save her life, and the brakeman saw her, and gave the engineer an additional signal to proceed, and the train moved on. Held, that the question of the wantonness of defendant's employés was for the jury.

3. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries caused by its negligence, an amendment alleging that the acts of defendant were willfully done does not materially alter the cause of action, so as to make a plea of limitations available.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. Cross, Judge.

Action by Nannie Esrey against the Southern Pacific Company for personal injuries caused by defendant's negligence. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Foshay Walker, for appellant. Justin Jacobs and Bradley & Farnsworth, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff recovered a judgment for damages against defendant for personal injuries sustained by being struck by a moving car of defendant. Defendant has appealed from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. The case has once been before the court (88 Cal. 399, 26 Pac. 211), and a detailed statement of the facts may there be found. For our present purposes, the following facts, as testified to by plaintiff, are deemed material: Upon attempting to leave the depot grounds of defendant, and with a view of going around the end of the depot platform, plaintiff crossed the railroad track, and thereupon found herself between the outside rail of the track and the platform of the depot, which platform was about five feet in height, and the width of this intervening space was about three feet. At this moment of time a train came backing towards her, composed of flat cars, which prevented her going further; and for her own safety she stood against the side of the platform, with the object of allowing the cars to pass by. The original width of this space being but three feet, and the cars extending some distance outside and beyond the track, it is apparent that plaintiff, at this time, was in such close quarters as to be not only in an unpleasant position, but, it may be said, a dangerous one; and it will be further conceded that she found herself in that position by reason of her own thoughtlessness and want of care. One or more cars passed her at this time, and there is no question but that the two brakemen, and possibly the engineer and fireman, saw her standing in this position. The train was backed a short distance beyond the point where she stood, when it stopped a moment. A box car was attached thereto, and it then started to retrace its course. When the box car came to the point where plaintiff was standing,—it being wider than the flat cars, and leaving a space next to the platform of not more than 14 inches,—it inevitably struck her, and the injury resulted.

Upon the foregoing state of facts, we think the jury entirely justified in finding a verdict in favor of plaintiff. By her own negligence she placed herself in a position of danger, but defendant was aware of her danger, and did not exercise ordinary care to protect her from the danger that surrounded her. Under these conditions the law gives the injured person a right of action. This right of action is based upon the principle that a failure to exercise ordinary care by a defendant, under such circumstances, amounts to a degree of reckless conduct that may well be termed willful and wanton; and, when an act is done willfully and wantonly, contributory negligence upon the part of the person injured is not an element which will defeat a recovery. Some text writers and courts declare the same principle, in another form, by holding that under these circumstances the contributory negligence of the party injured is not the proximate cause of the injury, but that the negligence of the defendant, being the later negligence, is the sole proximate cause. As has been said by one of our law reviews, "the party who last has a clear opportunity of avoiding the accident, notwithstanding the negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible." As fully sustaining these general principles, see Shear. & R. Neg. § 99; Cooley, Torts, p. 674; Romick v. Railroad Co., 62 Iowa, 167, 17 N. W. 458; Williams v. Railroad Co., 72 Cal. 120, 13 Pac. 219; Needham v. Railroad Co., 37 Cal. 409; Robinson v. Railroad Co., 48 Cal. 423; Holmes v. Railway Co., 97 Cal. 161, 31 Pac. 834.

In addition to the foregoing statement of facts, it further appears that after plaintiff had been struck by the car, and had thrown herself upon the ground to save her life, the brakeman saw her in this most dangerous position, and instead of stopping the train, and removing her from still greater threatened calamities, he gave an additional signal to the engineer to proceed, and the train moved on, plaintiff remaining in this dangerous position. Even though the employés were not aware at this time that she had been injured by the car, we think, taking this circumstance into consideration, in connection with all the other circumstances which we have stated, the question as to the wantonness and willfulness of the employés' acts in moving the train was a question of fact, which the jury were well justified in finding against the defendant. To commit an act recklessly is to commit it wantonly; and in this case the manner in which this train was moved after the box car was attached, the employés knowing the dangerous position of the plaintiff at the time, indicated such a spirit of reckless indifference on their part towards the plaintiff's safety that the jury were justified in saying that their act was willful and wanton; and it was a most fortunate circumstance that plaintiff's life was not the forfeit of defendant's conduct.

In view of the suggestion of the court made at the time the case was previously before us, the plaintiff, prior to the present trial in the court below, amended her complaint by charging the acts of the defendant to have been willfully and wantonly done. Conceding this form of allegation necessary to support the judgment,—and the law of the case would seem to so declare,—still we do not think the cause of action has been materially altered by the amendment, and consequently the plea of the statute of limitations is not well taken. The amendment pertains wholly to the manner in which the injury was inflicted, and actual damage is all that is sought to be recovered. The gist of the action is a claim of actual damages for personal injuries inflicted by defendant's moving cars, and these are the facts found stated in the original complaint. Appellant, to support its contention, relies upon various cases cited from the later Indiana Reports. The courts of that state, in declaring the law upon this question, have drawn the lines very closely around the injured party, and have declared the law against him in cases where we think the better doctrine, and the one most generally approved, would have declared in his favor. In this state the principle recognized and adopted does not go to the lengths found in the language of those decisions. And the case of Railway Co. v. Bryan, 107 Ind. 51, 7 N. E. 807, seems to state the rule more liberally in favor of a plaintiff seeking to recover for personal injuries upon the present lines than has been done by other Indiana cases preceding it.

The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial has been heretofore dismissed, and, as a result, it will not be necessary to consider some of the questions discussed in appellant's original brief. But, regardless of the claim upon the part of the respondent that the evidence cannot be considered upon this appeal, as will be observed, we have carefully considered it. We think the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied, and that there is no valid objection to the law given to the jury.

Whatever may have been said by the court in the former appeal as to the character and weight of evidence was said expressly in view of the fact that the willfulness and wantonness of the acts of defendant were not matters before the court; and for these reasons we are not called upon to compare the evidence disclosed by the record in that case with the evidence now before us, for the purpose of showing any existing differences therein, and thus avoiding the binding effect of the principle of the law of the case. It is conclusively shown that the evidence was considered in the light of the complaint then before the court, and in that light alone, when we look to the language of the opinion. It is there said: "But the defendant's employés saw her in time to have avoided the accident, and hence were bound to use care. The brakemen ought to have stopped the train, and, if necessary, compelled her to get out of harm's way." If such was the duty of the brakemen (and we have no doubt of it), the defendant was liable in damages for a violation of that duty; for the brakemen did not stop the train, and allow or compel the plaintiff to remove from her dangerous situation. And the language used by the learned commissioner indicates that if the complaint had been sufficiently broad in its allegations the judgment would not have been reversed. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

WHITE v. HARRIS et al. (No. 19,339.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1894.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT OF BENEFITS—VALIDITY.

1. Failure to form a district on which should be chargeable the expense of constructing a sewer, as provided by Act March 18, 1885, does not render void an assessment for a sewer, as Act March 18, 1885, as amended by Act March 14, 1889, authorizes the construction of sewers without the formation of such district.

2. Under Act March 18, 1885, providing that the superintendent of streets shall fix the time for the commencement of work to be performed under a contract for the construction of sewers, "which shall not be more than 15 days from the date of the contract," a contract providing that the work shall be commenced within 15 days sufficiently fixes the time.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by S. White against Charles T. Harris and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John T. Jones, for appellant. Wells, Monroe & Lee, Allen & Flint, and M. T. Allen, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, J. Action to foreclose a lien alleged to have been created by an assessment upon the defendants' lot for the construction of a sewer in front thereof, and along the streets described in the complaint. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the court, and, upon plaintiff declining to further amend, judgment was given for the defendants, from which judgment plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll alone.

The only ground urged here, upon which the complaint was held to be insufficient by the court below, is that it failed to allege the formation of a district upon which should be chargeable the expense and cost of constructing the sewer, as required by section 27 of the act approved March 18, 1885. As this act and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 14, 1889, furnish, independent of the section referred to, ample authority for the construction of sewers by a city without the formation of a district to be assessed for that purpose, and also provide for the payment of the expenses and costs thereof by an assessment upon the lots or land fronting upon the streets along which such sewer is constructed, it follows that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer on this ground.

The remaining point raised in support of the demurrer, that the contract under which the sewer was constructed did not fix the date for the commencement of the work, as required by section 6 of the said act of 1885, is not well founded. The contract set out in the complaint provides as follows: "Work to be commenced within fifteen days." Section 6, referred to, provides that the superintendent of streets "shall fix the time for the commencement [referring to the work to be performed under the contract], which shall not be more than fifteen days from the date of the contract." The word "time," as here used, was not intended to mean a particular day to be fixed by the superintendent of streets for the commencement of the work, but that the time fixed by him for that purpose should not be more than 15 days from the date of the contract. Let the judgment be reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

PEOPLE v. CURRY. (No. 21,110.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DEFENDANT AS WITNESS—INSTRUCTION.

1. The denial of a new trial will not be disturbed where there is evidence to sustain the verdict.

2. It is not reversible error to charge that "the defendant in a criminal case, testifying in his own behalf, occupies a relation to the case different from that occupied by any other witness," where the charge defines expressly the relation.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Matthew Curry was convicted of robbery, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

R. A. King and C. C. McComas, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the State.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. It is insisted that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The sufficiency of the evidence has been passed upon by the jury, and again by the trial court when considering the motion for a new trial, and under such circumstances we are averse to nullifying their action. The evidence of the prosecuting witness, especially as strengthened by that of the police officer, is ample to sustain the verdict. The venue also is sufficiently shown by the record.

The court instructed the jury that "the defendant in a criminal case, testifying in his own behalf, occupies a relation to the case different from that occupied by any other witness; and in considering the weight and effect to be given to the testimony of this defendant, in addition to noticing his manner," etc. (Then follows the balance of the stereotyped instruction upon this subject.) Appellant specially attacks that part of the instruction wherein the jury is told that the defendant, in testifying, occupied a different relation to the case from that of other witnesses. Inasmuch as that portion of the instruction following declares expressly wherein the defendant occupied a different relation to the case from other witnesses, and to what extent that relation might be considered in weighing defendant's evidence, no harm was done him by the giving of the instruction. Such must necessarily be so, for this portion of the instruction has been repeatedly given by trial courts, assailed by appellants, and approved upon appeal by this court. We have often suggested that the better practice would be to refrain from instructing jurors to the effect as evidenced by the foregoing instruction, but the suggestion appears to fall upon stony places, and brings forth no results. We shall limit the rule strictly as it has been heretofore declared, and new trials will be the result if those limits are overstepped to any extent. We think this case comes fairly within the rule. We find nothing further in the record demanding our attention. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

BROWN v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF POMONA. (No. 19,354.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1894.)

CONTRACTS OF CITY—ULTRA VIRES—PLEADING.

As the authority of a municipal corporation to make a contract not void on its face will be presumed, the defense of ultra vires, in an action thereon, must be raised by answer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by C. H. Brown against the board of education of the city of Pomona to recover for architect's services. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee and Wm. Pollard, for appellant. W. A. Bell and C. E. Sumner, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was rendered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

It is averred in the complaint that at defendant's request the plaintiff made and delivered to defendant certain plans and specifications for two public school buildings, to be built in the city of Pomona, which were duly approved, accepted, and adopted by defendant; that the services of plaintiff, in preparing and furnishing the same to defendant, were reasonably worth a certain stated sum of money; that plaintiff has demanded of defendant payment of said sum of money; and that defendant has not, nor has any one, paid the same or any part thereof, and the whole thereof remains due and unpaid. The prayer is for judgment for said sum of money. It is clear that the question here involved, and the only question upon which we can pass, is a pure question of pleading. The decisions of this court, cited by counsel for respondent, declaring the general doctrine that a contract which a municipal corporation attempts to make in violation of or beyond its chartered powers is void, are not in point, for they were made upon facts found on issues joined. No one of them, from Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, to Barry v. Goad, 89 Cal. 215, 26 Pac. 785, dealt with a question of pleading such as is presented in the case at bar. It is contended by respondent that the defendant had no power to make the contract sued on; but surely, when a corporation seeks to avoid its own contract on the ground of its want of power to contract, it must make good its defense of ultra vires by plea and proof. "A contract by a corporation, which is not, upon its face, necessarily beyond the scope of its authority, will, in the absence of proof, be presumed to be valid." Union Water Co. v. Murphy's Flat Fluming Co., 22 Cal. 621; Shaver v. Mining Co., 10 Cal. 400; Evans v. Bailey, 66 Cal. 112, 4 Pac. 1089; Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543. And with respect to mere ordinary business contracts a municipal or quasi municipal corporation stands on the same footing with other corporations. If a contract for the drawing of plans and specifications in anticipation of proceedings for the building of a schoolhouse was entirely beyond the scope of the powers of the respondent, and could not be legally made by it under any conceivable circumstances, then the point sought to be made by respondent might perhaps be raised on demurrer; but the position that respondent could not under any circumstances make such a contract is not tenable. We do not understand respondent to insist on that position, his contention being that such a contract can be made only under certain circumstances. As to the form of the complaint, we think it sufficient. "Corporations may be bound by implied contracts within the scope of their authority," and "municipal corporations are liable to actions of implied assumpsit." Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 459, 938. And in Hunt v. City of San Francisco, 11 Cal. 258, the court said: "We have held that the common counts, in the usual form adopted under the old system of pleading, are good in actions against private persons, and we cannot see either the necessity or propriety of holding a different rule in respect to corporations of whatever kind. The rules of pleading are general. They are designed to embrace all persons, natural or artificial, capable of suing or being sued." With the real merits of this case, as they may appear when properly presented, we cannot deal on this appeal. If the contract sued on was invalid or void, or if for any reason it was one which appellant cannot enforce, respondent can defeat the action upon sufficient answer and evidence. But we think that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the superior court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

COFFEE v. WILLIAMS. (No. 19,316.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1894.)

ACCOUNT STATED — IMPEACHMENT — PLEADING — HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where the existence of a stated account is denied by defendant, and the only evidence of the same is the testimony of plaintiff and that of a friendly witness, evidence of the falsity of the items in the account, and the circumstances of the transaction, are admissible to show that there never was such an account.

2. Error in striking out parts of an answer is not prejudicial, where the remainder is sufficient to cover the things sought to be proven in defense.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 454, in account stated, plaintiff, on demand, should furnish defendant with a copy of the stated account, though he need not furnish the original items of the open account.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by George W. Coffee against C. S. Williams. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. Rousseau, for appellant. Mahon & Laird and B. Brundage, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and also from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. It is averred in the complaint, in brief, that on November 13, 1888, the two parties formed a copartnership in the business of farming and stock raising, which continued until June 2, 1891, when it was dissolved by mutual consent; that they contributed equal amounts of capital, and were to share equally in profits and losses; that on February 5, 1891, they had an accounting of all their partnership dealings down to that date, and thereupon "an account was stated" between them of all said dealings, and upon such statement a balance of $1,851.96 was found due from defendant to plaintiff; and "that the said defendant then and there acquiesced in said statement, and agreed to pay said balance," but has refused to pay the same, or any part thereof. It is also averred that after said February 5th, and up to June 2d,—the date of the dissolution,—there were certain other partnership transactions, upon which defendant is further indebted to plaintiff, and that there is certain partnership property remaining to be disposed of. The prayer is—First, for judgment against defendant for said $1,851.96 alleged to be due on said account stated; and, second, that an account be taken of all partnership dealings subsequent to said February 5th, and that there be a final settlement and distribution of any property left after payment of debts, etc. The alleged stated account is not set forth in the complaint. There is merely a general averment that there was such an account, and that there is due thereupon, from defendant to plaintiff, the said sum of $1,851.96. The answer admits the formation and dissolution of the copartnership at the times stated in the complaint, but avers that it included buying and selling and dealing in live stock, as well as stock raising. It denies that the parties put equal amounts of capital in the business, and avers that defendant contributed $7,310 of capital, and plaintiff only $3,110. It denies that on February 5, 1891, or at any other time, there was an accounting of all the partnership dealings, or that any account was stated between the parties, or that a balance was struck of $1,851.96, or any other sum, or that defendant acquiesced in any statement, or agreed to pay to plaintiff or to said partnership said sum or any sum of money. There are many other averments in the answer to the effect that defendant was ignorant of business, and intrusted the entire management of the partnership to plaintiff; that plaintiff, intending to defraud defendant, kept no books of accounts, and concealed from defendant the business transactions of the partnership. The following averment in the answer was, on motion of plaintiff, stricken out by the court, viz.: "That on the 5th day of February, 1891, the plaintiff and defendant were in Bakersfield, and went to the store of one Dave Hirshfeld to confer about their partnership affairs, at which time and place plaintiff procured to be written in a book, which the plaintiff then and there had, certain words and figures, an exact copy of which is hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this answer. That no settlement was made on said 5th day of February, 1891, by or between plaintiff and defendant, of any partnership dealings or transactions, and no balance was figured up as to any indebtedness of plaintiff or defendant, and no promise was made by either to pay the other any sum of money whatever." The answer further avers that plaintiff made large sales of partnership property to several named persons, of which no mention is made in said Exhibit A, and specifies large items in the same which are alleged to be incorrect and false. Numerous general averments of fraud are also made in the answer, against plaintiff, and it contains other averments not necessary to be here mentioned. The court found that there was an account stated, as averred in the complaint, and gave judgment for plaintiff for its amount; and the case having been referred to take an account of the partnership dealings subsequent to said February 5th, and the referee having made his report, a final decree was entered. The main contest on the appeal is about said stated account.

The only document, or copy of a document, purporting to be the account stated, relied on by plaintiff, which we are able to find in the transcript, is the Exhibit A attached to defendant's answer. Plaintiff, so far as we have discovered, did not introduce in evidence any stated account. He offered at one time certain pages of a book, which, as we suppose, were intended to show said account; but an objection to the book was at that time sustained, and we do not find when he again offered the book, or any other writing purporting to be a stated account. Defendant demanded the account of plaintiff, under section 454, Code Civ. Proc., but it was not furnished. Plaintiff's witness, Hirshfeld, testified that he made the stated account in a book of plaintiff, and also copied it in a book of defendant; and, as Exhibit A was a copy from defendant's book, we assume that Exhibit A is the alleged account stated sued on. It is as follows:

It is doubtful if the foregoing would, under any view, constitute an independent cause of action as an account stated. An account stated is a document—a writing—which exhibits the state of account between parties, and the balance owing from one to the other; and when assented to, either expressly or impliedly, it becomes a new contract. An action upon it is not founded upon the original items, but upon the balance agreed to by the parties. And the general rule is that, when the stated account is admitted, it can be avoided only by averment and proof of fraud, mistake, etc. 6 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 424 et seq.; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 191 et seq.; Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 566, 17 Pac. 702, and cases cited. But the account, in order to constitute a contract, should appear to be something more than a mere memorandum. It should show upon its face that it was intended to be a final settlement up to date. And this should be expressed with clearness and certainty. The account sued on in the case at bar as an account stated is certainly very loose and unsatisfactory. But few items of account are given; there are no dates, except one; dollar marks are not even placed before the figures; and there is no balance struck or stated. It looks like a mere memorandum put together hastily for further consideration,—not like so important a writing as an account stated. It is possible, perhaps, for an account stated, which does not state a balance, to be good, if, from a calculation upon the figures given, a balance can be ascertained; but an account sent by a merchant or banker without any balance stated would be a rare document. However, a calculation of the figures written in Exhibit A will not give the balance asserted by plaintiff, viz. $1,851.96. It would differ from that result to the extent of at least $500. Plaintiff would explain that by saying that the item of $500, of the date of February 5th, accrued after the alleged settlement. Nevertheless it is part of the alleged stated account.

Assuming, however, that the paper in question is not so deficient in form that it could not, upon any proof, pass muster as an account stated, still it is clear that defendant, under the positive denials in the answer, should have been allowed great latitude in introducing evidence to disprove it; and we think that the court erred in sustaining objections to evidence which he offered on that point. The evidence of plaintiff on the point consisted of his own testimony and that of his witness, Hirshfeld, who was very friendly to plaintiff; and it was to the general effect that some time in the month of February, 1891, plaintiff and defendant, together with Hirshfeld, met at the store of the latter to "see how we stood up to date;" that they had squabbles over certain matters, but that finally, on February 5th, they settled; that what is called the account stated was made by Hirshfeld in a book of plaintiff, and afterwards copied in a book of defendant; that a balance was struck, showing that defendant owed plaintiff $1,851.96; and that defendant acquiesced therein and agreed to pay said sum. Defendant, on his part, testified that he met plaintiff at Hirshfeld's because there was some company debts to be paid,—particularly a debt to one Dinkelspiel,—and to get some idea or knowledge how the company stood; that plaintiff's books "did not show much of anything," that he could not tell anything about the account, and did not have anything he could settle by; that he had defendant charged with different sums of money which he objected to; that they then settled with Dinkelspiel, and paid his bill; that plaintiff said that Hirshfeld's bills had been forgotten, and he would bring them next morning; that he did not bring them next morning, but they settled with Hirshfeld, and then "quit." He further testified that plaintiff had sold stock, of which there was no account on his books; that defendant had trusted the whole business to plaintiff (which plaintiff admits), and that there were no accounts kept, upon which any settlement could be made; that plaintiff had put into the capital stock only $3,110, as shown by said alleged account stated, and that he had not put in the second item of $3,000, or any part of it; that the $2,700 charged to defendant should have been only $2,100, and was money paid for defendant to one Kraus; that the $2,000 charged to defendant was wholly incorrect; that various other items in said alleged stated account were incorrect; and that large transactions were not mentioned in said account. In defendant's answer, it is averred that, between the commencement of the partnership and said February 5th, plaintiff sold to certain parties named therein cattle to the amount, in money, of over $36,000. Now, as to the question whether or not there had been an account stated, as alleged in the complaint, there was the testimony of plaintiff and Hirshfeld on the one side, and the testimony of defendant on the other. Under this condition of the testimony, defendant sought to introduce evidence of circumstances which he claimed would tend to show that it was,—if not impossible,—at least highly improbable, that he ever agreed to such an alleged account stated as that averred in the complaint. This evidence was ruled out by the court upon the theory that, when there is an account stated, parties cannot go back, and attack the original items of the account, unless upon proper averment of fraud, mistake, etc. This is no doubt the rule when the account stated is admitted, but in the case at bar the main issue was the question whether there was such an account. While that issue was before the court, of course, no evidence about the original items was admissible for the purpose of surcharging the account; but in determining the existence of the stated account the court was not confined to considering the mere naked "yes" and "no" of the witnesses. The defendant had the right to show, if he could, the inherent improbability of his agreement to such an account; and, to that end, evidence was admissible of at least the general nature of the circumstances of the business between the parties, and the character of the objections made by defendant to the items of the alleged account stated. If, for instance, it be true that the item of $2,700 should be only $2,100; that the item of $2,000 is false; that plaintiff contributed only $3,110, instead of $6,110, to the capital stock; that plaintiff, who conducted the whole business, had kept no accounts, and had nothing to present as a basis of settlement; that there was over $30,000 worth of stock sold by plaintiff which formed no part of the alleged statement of account; and that defendant, in the attempts at settlement, had objected to all these things, —then these matters were proper for the court to consider in determining whether defendant acquiesced in an account so radically different from the truth, and from his own contentions. If, after considering these matters, the court should be of the opinion that there was an account stated, as alleged, it would sustain the account, without reference to the original items; and, if after such consideration it should think the preponderance of evidence to be against the stated account, it would so find, and would then order an account to be taken de novo of all the partnership dealings. But, in determining the first question before it, was there an account stated, as averred? the court erred in ruling out a great deal of evidence offered by defendant.

There were about 70 rulings of the court, sustaining objections to questions asked by defendant, each followed by an exception. Some of them were asked in cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses, and others of them were asked of defendant and his witnesses. They are too numerous to be each noticed here. Some of them were, perhaps, for special reasons, properly ruled out, but most of them should have been admitted. What we have said will clearly enough show our views on the subject, namely, that evidence touching the nature of the partnership business of plaintiff and defendant, and the character of certain items put in and omitted from the alleged account, is admissible upon the point whether or not there ever was such an account stated as that relied on by plaintiff. A few instances of objections sustained will be sufficient to illustrate our meaning. Upon cross-examination of plaintiff an objection was sustained to this question: "He put in considerably more property than you did?" Plaintiff, having testified that he did not know if there was any indebtedness due the firm from third persons when the alleged account was taken, but there might have been, was asked by defendant this question: "Then it was taken into the account, if you talked it over?" and objection was sustained. Objection was also sustained to this question asked of plaintiff: "I will ask you if there was not considerable difficulty about a certain transaction, in which Mr. Charley Kraus had received some money from Mr. Williams, and that there was a variance between your accounts and Mr. Williams' of $600?" Also, to the following question asked of plaintiff's witness, Hirshfeld: "Do you know how much money has been paid in by either of the firm previous to that settlement?" Also, to the question: "Now, this $2,700. What was that?" Objection was sustained to this question asked of defendant: "Now, that first item, $2,000. State what you know about that?" Also, to the question: "I will ask you, Mr. Williams, if, on the 5th day of February, 1891, at the store of Dave Hirshfeld, any account was settled or gone into in relation to the number of cattle bought and sold, or the amount of money received from the sales of cattle of the partnership?" Also, to the question whether there was any account or settlement on that day of partnership money. Also, to the question whether there was any settlement or computation of amounts due to outside parties. Also, to the question, "Was there any settlement as to how much Mr. Coffee or Mr. Williams, or either of them, or both, owed to Mr. Hirshfeld for partnership goods bought previous to that time?" Also, to the question, "I will ask you, Mr. Williams, if you ever made any further efforts in adjusting the matter in regard to that $2,700?" Hirshfeld, having been recalled by plaintiff, and having stated on cross-examination that he had made the accounting between the parties on February 5th, and found the balance of $1,851.96, was asked this question: "Have you in your possession the amounts and items from which you struck that balance?" and objection to the question was sustained. Defendant, having testified that he did not acquiesce in the statement copied in his book by Hirshfeld, and that "the items of that statement were discussed by Coffee and me," was asked by his counsel this question: "State what items, and what was said," and an objection to this question was sustained. Objection was also sustained to the following question: "State, Mr. Williams, what was the point of difficulty, and, if it is so that you were eight or ten days laboring on that settlement, what was the difficulty?" (Plaintiff had testified that they were eight or ten days in settling.) The witness Hirshfeld, having testified that his books showed how much money he had paid out on the checks of each party and of both parties, was asked how much had been so paid out on each party's check, and objection was sustained. Objection was also sustained to the question, how much money he had received from each party. The court also refused to allow defendant to prove by the witness Dinkelspiel that he had received into his possession over $17,000 of the funds of the partnership of plaintiff and defendant, and sustained an objection to this question asked of the witness Briggs: "State, Mr. Briggs, whether or not Mr. Coffee told how much he had made by selling the cattle of the partnership." The foregoing questions, and many others of a similar kind, should have been allowed. It would certainly be difficult to believe that the defendant acquiesced in the alleged account stated, and promised to pay the alleged balance, if the things which he sought to prove are true. The errors committed in excluding said evidence are clearly material, and make necessary a reversal of the judgment and order appealed from.

We do not think that the appellant was prejudiced by the order of the court striking out of his answer the matter hereinbefore shown to have been stricken out, for the answer was left sufficiently full to cover the things sought to be proven in defense.

We do not think that the attempted averments of fraud in the answer were specific enough to warrant a defense upon that ground.

The respondent should have given to appellant a copy of the alleged stated account sued on. He need not have furnished the original items of the open account upon which the alleged stated account was based, but a copy of the stated account itself should have been furnished.

Before another trial each party should be allowed, if he so desire, to make proper amendments to his pleadings. We cannot refrain, however, from expressing the hope that they may be able to arrive at an amicable settlement of their difficulties. Considering the confused state of their accounts, it will be hard for a court to arrive at a just solution of their contentions; and it would be better for each to concede something than to prolong expensive and perhaps ruinous litigation. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HIGH v. BANK OF COMMERCE. (No. 19,393.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1894.)

EXECUTION — SUPPLEMENTARY PROCEEDINGS AGAINST SUPPOSED DEBTOR OF EXECUTION DEBTOR—EVIDENCE.

In supplementary proceedings, evidence that some time prior to the execution there probably was a small balance in a bank, on open account, in favor of one of the execution debtors, will not warrant the supreme court in holding that the bank was indebted to defendant in execution.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by John E. High against the Bank of Commerce, a corporation, as a supposed debtor of Comstock & Trotsche, copartners, against whom plaintiff had obtained a money judgment, on which execution was issued. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

David L. Withington, for appellant. Luce & McDonald, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Plaintiff, having a money judgment against Comstock & Trotsche, copartners, and having procured an execution to be issued, and claiming that the defendant was indebted to Comstock & Trotsche, proceeded under section 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and procured an order allowing him to sue the defendant, and thereupon he commenced this action. The court found that, at the time the said proceeding was instituted, defendant was not indebted to said copartners, or either of them, and did not have any money or property belonging to them. Assuming that the transcript shows upon what grounds the motion for a new trial was made or denied, still the only point made by appellant is that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. The evidence is very meager; and we would not be warranted in holding that the court below should have found some indebtedness from respondent to the said copartners, or that there was money of the latter in the hands of the former. There is some evidence tending to show that, at a time prior to the proceedings supplementary to execution, there probably was a small balance in the bank, on open account, in favor of one of the said copartners; but the presumption that "a thing once proven to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature" is shown by human experience to be not applicable to a balance in one's favor in a bank. There is nothing in the point that a general denial did not raise the issues passed upon by the court. Neither was the order of the judge on the proceedings supplementary to execution an adjudication of the rights of the parties. "His only power in the premises was to make an order authorizing the judgment creditor to institute an action in the proper court," and, if he chose so to do, to forbid a transfer pending the action. McDowell v. Bell, 86 Cal. 616, 25 Pac. 128. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BAILIFF v. POWERS et al. (No. 15,552.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1894.)

TRIAL—FAILURE TO MAKE FINDINGS.

A judgment will not be reversed because of a refusal to find upon a material issue, unless the record shows that there was evidence to sustain the finding.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Bailiff against Powers and others. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James W. Oates, for appellant. Geo. Pearce, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The appeal is from the judgment alone, upon the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions. The only point urged by the appellant, for a reversal, is that the court failed to find upon all of the issues in the case. A failure to find upon a material issue will not, however, authorize a reversal of a judgment, unless it appears from the record that there was evidence before the trial court from which it could make a finding upon such issue. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504; Dolliver v. Dolliver, 94 Cal. 646, 30 Pac. 4; Hulsman v. Todd, 96 Cal. 228, 31 Pac. 39; Rogers v. Duff, 97 Cal. 66, 31 Pac. 836. As the record in the present case fails to show that any evidence was introduced upon these issues, it follows that there was no error in failing to make findings thereon. The findings fully support the judgment, and it is affirmed.

HERMAN v. SANTEE et al. (No. 19,357.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1894.)

WRITS — AMENDMENT OF RETURN — NOTICE OF MOTION.

1. Where a summons has been properly served, but the proof of service is defective, the court may, after judgment, allow an amended affidavit of service to be filed nunc pro tunc as of the date of the judgment. Reinhart v. Lugo, 24 Pac. 1089, 86 Cal. 395, disapproved.

2. Where, on the return day of a motion, the adversary of the moving party, without any previous notice, makes another motion, and the same is, without objection, argued at length, and a general exception taken to the granting thereof, notice of such motion will be deemed to have been waived.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Minnie J. Herman against Milton Santee and others to foreclose a mortgage. A motion by plaintiff for leave to file an affidavit of service nunc pro tunc as of the date of judgment was granted, and defendant Milton Santee appeals. Affirmed.

David L. Worthington and Works & Works, for appellant. Conklin & Hughes, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage given to secure payment of a promissory note made by the appellant, Milton Santee. On September 8, 1892, a decree of foreclosure was entered as prayed for, reciting that the "defendants have been duly and regularly summoned to answer unto the plaintiff's complaint herein, and made default in that behalf, and that the default of each defendant for not appearing and answering unto plaintiff's complaint has been duly and regularly entered herein." Subsequently, appellant gave notice of a motion to vacate and set aside the decree, so far as it provided for a deficiency judgment against him, upon the ground that previous to the institution of the action he had been discharged from the indebtedness sought to be enforced, by a discharge in insolvency. The motion came on to be heard on September 1, 1893, both parties being present in court by their attorneys. Before the hearing commenced, the respondent, without any previous notice, presented to the court an amended affidavit of service of the summons and complaint in the case, and asked for an order that the same be filed nunc pro tunc as of September 8, 1892, and made a part of the judgment roll. The attorney for appellant objected to the order asked for, and stated that "as the decision of the motion would, in his judgment, be decisive of the motion made to vacate the judgment by defendant Santee, he would like permission to introduce his authorities upon the motion before the court." Thereupon, the motion was argued "at length," and during the course of the argument the attorney stated that he appeared as amicus curiae. After the argument was concluded, the court granted the motion, and the appellant excepted to the ruling. The appeal is from the judgment, and the order granting respondent's motion.

The summons was served by a person other than the sheriff, and the affidavit of service, as originally made and returned, was defective and insufficient, because it did not state that the affiant was over the age of 18 years at the time of the service. The appellant contends that, because the affidavit of service was insufficient, the clerk had no authority to enter the default, and the court had no jurisdiction to enter the judgment, and that both the default and judgment were void. It is true that the clerk was a mere ministerial officer, and could perform only ministerial duties. Conceding, therefore, that in the absence of due proof of the service of the summons the clerk had no right to enter the default, still that fact is unimportant, and can cut no figure in the decision of the case. A valid judgment by default may be rendered by the court, though no formal default has been entered. "The only purpose of a default is to limit the time during which the defendant may file his answer, and that time never extends beyond a trial and judgment." Drake v. Duvenick, 45 Cal. 463.

The important question, then, is, was the judgment void? Section 416 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that, "from the time of the service of the summons and of a copy of the complaint in a civil action, * * * the court is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction of the parties, and to have control of all the subsequent proceedings." In Pico v. Sunol, 6 Cal. 295, it is said: "Jurisdiction of the person of defendant is acquired by the service of process, and dates from such service, and not from the return." And in Drake v. Duvenick, supra, it is said: "The fact of service was material, and from the time service was made the court was deemed to have acquired jurisdiction. The return of service might be formal or informal, perfect or imperfect. Still, if service were in fact made, the court acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant." So, in Estate of Newman, 75 Cal. 220, 16 Pac. 887, it is said: "It is the fact of service which gives the court jurisdiction, not the proof of service." The amended affidavit of service, which the court allowed to be filed, was in all respects in proper form, and showed that the appellant was regularly served with a copy of the summons and complaint. None of the facts stated in the affidavit are controverted; and it must be held, therefore, that from the time of the service the court acquired jurisdiction of the parties to the action.

The question then arises, did the court err in allowing the proof of service to be amended and filed nunc pro tunc as of the date of the judgment? Upon this subject, Mr. Freeman, in his work on Judgments (4th Ed., § 89b), states the law as follows: "If the return upon the summons or other writ designed to give the court jurisdiction over the person of the defendant is omitted, or incorrectly made, but the facts really existed which were required to give the court jurisdiction, the weight of authority at the present time permits the officer to correct or supply his return until it states the truth, though by such correction a judgment apparently void is made valid. Though the proof of the service of process does not consist of the return of an officer, the like rule prevails. Thus, if a summons has been published in the manner required by law, but the proof of publication found in the files of the court is defective, the court may, on the fact of due publication being shown, permit an affidavit to be filed showing the facts, and when so filed it will support the judgment, as if filed before its entry." In opposition to this view, and in support of his theory, appellant cites Reinhart v. Lugo, 86 Cal. 395, 24 Pac. 1089, in which, on page 401, 86 Cal., and page 1089, 24 Pac., it is said: "The default and judgment were void, not because there was no service, but because there was, at the time of entering the same, no proof of service." This language is not in harmony with the weight of authority upon the subject, and in our opinion it does not state the law correctly. The case is reported in the American State Reports (volume 21, p. 52), and, in a note commenting upon it, it is said: "The court declares, in effect, that it is not the service of process which gives courts jurisdiction, but the proof of such service; that if the proof is defective it is immaterial that the service was perfect; and, the proof being imperfect, there is no way in which the judgment can be sustained by showing the facts regarding the service of process as they really existed when it was entered. The very reverse of this we apprehend to be the law. It is the fact of service of process which confers jurisdiction, and it is a familiar practice in California, as well as elsewhere, when the proof of such service is absent or defective, to permit it to be amended or supplied." And again: "To support judgments entered upon insufficient proof of service of process, or without the proof of such service appearing in the record, courts have uniformly permitted such proof to be amended or supplied, not for the purpose of authorizing them to enter new judgments based upon such proof, but to show that judgments previously entered were not entered without jurisdiction, and are not, and never were, void;" citing Allison v. Thomas, 72 Cal. 562, 14 Pac. 309, and numerous other cases. We conclude, therefore, in view of the authorities, that the judgment in question was not void, and the court did not err in permitting the amended affidavit of service to be filed.

It is further claimed that the application to file the amended affidavit was without notice, and the order authorizing the filing was therefore erroneous. But, conceding that previous notice of the application should have been given, still we are unable to see that appellant was in any way prejudiced by the failure. He was present in court when the motion was made, and raised no such objection then. On the contrary, he proceeded to argue the question at length, and, when it was decided against him, took a general exception to the ruling. This was in effect a waiver of notice, and appellant cannot now be heard to complain of the action of the court on this ground. We discover no prejudicial error in the record, and therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PEOPLE v. MOORE. (No. 21,087.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 11, 1894.)

SODOMY—INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY — CONDUCT OF TRIAL—CHALLENGE OF JURORS—FAILURE TO INFORM DEFENDANT OF HIS RIGHTS.

1. An information which charges that defendant committed the crime against nature in and upon the "person" of Carl K. sufficiently states that it was committed with a human being, as distinguished from an animal.

2. Where defendant has no counsel, it is reversible error for the court to fail to comply with Pen. Code, § 1066, which provides that, before a juror is called, defendant must be informed that if he intends to challenge an individual juror he must do so when the juror appears, and before he is sworn.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

William H. Moore was convicted of the crime against nature, and appeals. Reversed.

Wm. Fitzgerald, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime against nature, and was sentenced to suffer the very severe penalty of imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 41 years. He appeals from the judgment.

The appellant had no counsel in the court below. Consequently, there is no statement or bill of exceptions before us, and, of course, no evidence. Afterwards counsel took an appeal for appellant, and is compelled to rely upon the judgment roll, or what is called in section 1207 of the Penal Code a "record of the action." This includes only the indictment or information, a copy of the minutes of the plea or demurrer, a copy of the minutes of the trial, the instructions given or refused, and a copy of the judgment. The offense charged in this case is, in its nature, coarse and detestable; but it is an offense easily charged, and difficult to disprove. It affords great facility for a false accusation made for the purpose of revenge and injury, and usually its proof depends mainly upon the testimony of an accomplice. These considerations, and the very severe penalty imposed, induce us to look closely into the only record which appellant's counsel on the appeal could bring here.

We are disposed to think that the objections to the sufficiency of the information are not good. The averment that the alleged crime was committed "in and upon the person of Carl Kohler" sufficiently states that it was committed with a human being, as distinguished from an animal. We think also, that the jurisdiction of the case in Kern county sufficiently appears from the face of the information. The crime is alleged to have been committed on a car; and whether or not the information would be good under section 783, Pen. Code, upon the theory that the jurisdiction was in any county through which the car passed in the course of its trip, we think that it sufficiently avers the offense to have been committed in Kern county. Appellant objects to the instructions of the court upon the subject of reasonable doubt; but, considering them all together, they are not erroneous.

We think, however, that under the circumstances of this particular case the judgment should be reversed for the failure of the court to inform the appellant of his rights, as provided in section 1066 of the Penal Code. That section is as follows: "Before a juror is called the defendant must be informed by the court, or under its direction, that if he intends to challenge an individual juror he must do so when the juror appears and before he is sworn." In all the decisions of this court, which have been called to our attention, where this section of the Code was under review, it has been held that a failure to comply with it is error, although, in those decisions, the failure was held not to be prejudicial, because in each case the defendant had been represented by counsel competent to protect his rights, and the right of challenge had been exercised. In People v. Mortier, 58 Cal. 266, the court, speaking of the provision of the Code, say: "The object of this provision of the law is to protect the rights of the defendant in the matter of challenging jurors. He should be informed of the fact that if he desires to challenge any particular juror he must exercise that right before the juror is sworn; but it appears from the record in the case that the defendant's rights in this respect were fully understood by him and his counsel, and the privilege of challenging jurors was exercised to a large extent in the case. It is true that the court omitted a duty imposed by law, but it clearly appears that the defendant was not in any manner prejudiced by the error complained of." In People v. O'Brien, 88 Cal. 489, 26 Pac. 362, the above language was quoted approvingly, the court holding, also, that under the facts in that case the error was not prejudicial. See, also, People v. Ellsworth, 92 Cal. 596, 28 Pac. 604. But the facts in the case at bar are materially different from those in the cases above noticed. Here the appellant had no counsel in the trial court, and did not exercise the right of challenge. There is nothing in the record to show that he was not prejudiced by the failure of the court to give the information required by the statute to be given,—nothing which enables us to avoid the general presumption that error is prejudicial. See People v. Gaines, 52 Cal. 479. The general rule that every one is presumed to know the law cannot be successfully invoked in a criminal case against a statute which provides that the defendant must be specially instructed as to what the law is on a particular point.

The minutes of the court, of the date of May 22, 1893, contained on pages 3, 4, and 5 of the transcript, show what was done at the trial, from the calling of the cause to the return of the verdict,—all occurring on said May 22d. Commencing on page 12 of the transcript, there is some printed matter without date, in which there is a statement that on May 22d there were certain conversations between the court, the counsel for the people, and the defendant, about the jurors. Following this, on page 14, there is matter which shows that there was a session of the court on December 30, 1893, —more than seven months after the trial, and after the appeal had been taken,—at which certain minutes of the trial were ordered corrected; and, so far as it can be ascertained from the transcript, the said statement, commencing on page 12, was ordered to be made nunc pro tunc at the said session of December 30th. This statement is relied on by respondent as showing that appellant was sufficiently informed of his right to challenge the jurors. While courts have a wide latitude in amending their records, it is extremely doubtful if a court can, in a criminal case, amend minutes which constitute part of a judgment roll after an appeal has been taken, and without notice. To do so would be, at least, the exercise of a very dangerous power. But, assuming that it can be rightfully done, we do not think that the statement in question at all shows a substantial compliance with the requirement of said section 1066 of the Code. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. MALLON. (No. 21,093.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 11, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS MADE IN DEFENDANT'S PRESENCE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT ROBBERY—INSTRUCTION—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. It is not error to admit evidence of statements made by a person indicted with the defendant on trial, and who has pleaded guilty, in the presence of defendant, where it shows what the conduct of defendant was at the time, and that he did not deny the statements. People v. Ah Yute, 54 Cal. 89, distinguished.

2. On the trial for assault with intent to commit robbery, a charge that if "you have no doubt he aided and participated in the assault, and have a reasonable doubt as to the intent of the assault, you must give him the benefit of that doubt, and in that case you must find him guilty of simple assault," did not assume any fact.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Joseph Mallon was convicted of an assault with intent to commit robbery, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Agustus Tilden, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant Mallon was charged, jointly with one Foran, with assault, with intent to commit robbery, upon the person of one John Tieck, and was convicted as charged. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Only two points are urged for a reversal: (1) That the court erred in admitting certain testimony of Crockett and Donovan, witnesses for the prosecution; and (2) that the court erred in giving a certain instruction, which, it is contended, assumed that an assault had been committed.

It is doubtful if the record shows any sufficient objection to that part of the testimony of Crockett and Donovan which is claimed to be inadmissible; but, assuming that it does, we do not think that there was error in admitting said testimony. These witnesses were allowed to testify, among other things, to certain statements made by the said Foran (who had pleaded guilty) in the presence of appellant; and it is this part of their testimony that is claimed by appellant to have been improperly admitted. This testimony, standing by itself, and without any connection with the conduct of appellant when the alleged statements were made, would no doubt have been clearly hearsay and inadmissible. But it is established law that while a statement made in the presence of the accused is not admissible as being itself evidence of any fact narrated in such statement, it is admissible, primarily, for the purpose of showing that the accused acquiesced in the statement, either by express assent or by silence, or by such conduct as fairly implied assent. People v. McCrea, 32 Cal. 98; People v. Estrado, 49 Cal. 171. Such testimony should, no doubt, be received guardedly. If not followed by any proof of the conduct of the accused, it should be stricken out; and, if requested by the defendant's counsel (which was not done in the case at bar), the court should instruct the jury that such statement was limited as evidence to the purpose above indicated. But it is not error to admit such statements in the first instance. In the case at bar, we think that it clearly appears what the conduct of defendant was when Foran was making his statements, and that he did not deny them. During the testimony of Crockett as to said statements, and after an objection had been made by defendant's counsel, the court said, "I assume that what the defendant at bar said and did in the course of that conversation will come out;" and the court then asked the witness, "What did the defendant here on trial,—what did he say?" to which the witness responded, "He didn't say anything when he told him that." And the witness afterwards said: "We were all together in one group. The defendant Mallon said nothing." The witness Donovan, after testifying to certain statements made by Foran to defendant, said that "He didn't answer at all," and, further, that when the witness asked the defendant, "You were there?" he replied, "Do you suppose I was a damn fool, to tell you I was there?" The case at bar, therefore, is not within the principle of People v. Ah Yute, 54 Cal. 89, invoked by appellant. In that case Mr. Justice Ross, delivering the opinion of the court, said that certain statements made in the presence of the defendant were hearsay and inadmissible because they stood "without any proof whatever as to the conduct by the defendant in reference to those accusations," and distinguished the case from People v. McCrea and People v. Estrado, which were approved. As, therefore, the rulings of the court below are not erroneous upon the ground taken by appellant, it is not necessary to inquire whether or not the said statements of Foran were admissible upon the ground of a proven conspiracy between the latter and the appellant to commit the crime charged.

2. The instruction complained of is as follows: "In case you have no doubt he aided and participated in the assault, and have a reasonable doubt as to the intent of the assault, you must give him the benefit of that doubt, and in that case you must find him guilty of simple assault." We do not see that this instruction assumes any fact. It is contended that it assumes that there was an assault committed, but if that be conceded it could in no way have prejudiced appellant. It was clearly shown, and undisputed, that an assault was committed on Tieck by Foran, with whom appellant entered Tieck's store, and that it was committed in the presence of appellant. Appellant testified to that himself. Judgment and order appealed from affirmed.

WICKERSHAM v. CRITTENDEN et al.

(No. 19,340.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1894.)

JUDGMENT — ALTERATION AFTER AFFIRMANCE ON APPEAL.

A minority stockholder in a bank, in certain actions on behalf of himself and other stockholders against C., the majority stockholder, the bank, and other defendants, recovered judgments against C. "to and for the use of" the bank, and "to be paid to" the bank "for its use and benefit," together with "his costs and disbursements herein taxed," at sums stated. Held, that the trial court could not, after such judgments were affirmed on appeal, on plaintiff's petition, order the clerk to pay plaintiff his attorneys' fees in such cases out of the money paid to the clerk on the judgments.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Two actions by A. G. Wickersham against James L. Crittenden, the Bank of San Luis Obispo, and others, in which there were judgments against defendant Crittenden for the use of defendant bank. From an order requiring the clerk to pay plaintiff $1,000, as attorneys' fees, out of money paid to the clerk on such judgments, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Graves & Graves and James L. Crittenden (Henry S. Foote, of counsel), for appellants. Lippitt & Lippitt and Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the appellants, Crittenden and the Bank of San Luis Obispo, from an order of the superior court directing its clerk to pay certain moneys to the respondent, Wickersham, for attorneys' fees alleged to have been paid out by him to his attorneys in certain actions. Wickersham and Crittenden were stockholders in the Bank of San Luis Obispo, a corporation; Crittenden owning a fraction over one-half of the capital stock of the bank, and Wickersham owning about two-thirds of the other half. They disagreed about the business and management of the bank, and Wickersham brought two actions against Crittenden, the bank, and certain other defendants. He alleged in his complaint in each action that he brought it for himself and stockholders other than the defendants. In one of the actions he recovered judgment, "to and for the use of the Bank of San Luis Obispo," against Crittenden, for $548.19, together with "his costs and disbursements herein, taxed at the sum of $111.30." In the other action he recovered judgment against Crittenden for $2,716.78, "to be paid to the defendant the Bank of San Luis Obispo, for its use and benefit," and "his costs herein, taxed at the sum of $69.40." In each case an appeal was taken to this court, and the judgment was affirmed. When the remittiturs went down to the superior court, Crittenden paid the amounts of the judgments "into court" for the satisfaction of the judgments; by which is meant, we suppose, that he paid the money to the clerk of the court. Afterwards, Wickersham filed a petition in the court, in which he stated that the moneys recovered on said judgments were for the benefit of the said bank and all its stockholders, and not for himself alone, and that he had paid out to his attorneys in said actions certain amounts of money; and he prayed for an order that he be paid the amount of the attorneys' fees out of the said money paid in by Crittenden, which, it seems, was still in the hands of the clerk. The bank and Crittenden appeared and demurred to the petition; but, after a hearing and the introduction of evidence, the court made an order that the clerk pay to Wickersham $1,000 as attorneys' fees in said two actions, and that he pay the balance of said money to said bank. It is not necessary to determine here whether or not in said two actions, which were practically between the main stockholders of a corporation contending for the control of its management and business, the prevailing party was entitled to recover attorney fees in addition to statutory costs and disbursements. The judgments as rendered in the superior court were affirmed in this court, and were, of course, final judgments, and they did not include attorneys' fees.

They directed the moneys recovered, together with the stated costs, to be paid to the bank; and the superior court could not, upon petition or motion, change or modify these final judgments by ordering the moneys recovered to be disposed of in any way other than provided in the judgments themselves. If respondent has any legal claim against the bank for money advanced to attorneys for conducting said actions, he must prosecute that claim by an ordinary civil action against the bank; but he cannot, upon motion, have a final judgment substantially opened and changed so as to include his claim. The cases cited by respondent (Alemany v. Wensinger, 40 Cal. 294; In re Paschal, 10 Wall. 493; and Trustees v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527) are not in point. Those cases merely declare the principle that in a proper case a trustee may be allowed, out of the trust fund, attorneys' fees expended in the necessary preservation or management of the fund; but there was no point made in them as to the method or procedure by which the allowance could be obtained, and in neither of them was an order like the one in the case at bar involved, made after a final judgment had been affirmed by the appellate court, and when there was no continuous administration of a trust. In those cases the order was made during the pendency of the litigation, and became part of the final judgment. The order appealed from is reversed.

Ex parte THOMAS. (No. 21,157.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1894.)

ADULTERY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Mere adultery, without open and notorious cohabitation, is not a criminal offense in California (St. 1871-72, p. 380), and a conviction thereof is void.

In bank.

Petition by one Thomas for a writ of habeas corpus, for the purpose of obtaining his discharge from the custody of the sheriff of San Francisco county, Cal., to which he was committed on being convicted of adultery. Writ granted, and petitioner discharged.

Geo. W. Monteith, for petitioner. W. S. Barnes, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The return to the writ of habeas corpus issued herein shows that the petitioner was convicted in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco of the crime of adultery, and thereupon sentenced to be imprisoned in the county jail for one year, and that he is now held in custody under commitment based upon said judgment. The judgment is void. Adultery is not made a crime by any statute of California. It is the living together in open and notorious cohabitation and adultery that is made criminal by the statute (St. 1871-72, p. 380), and it has been rightly held that mere adultery, without the notorious cohabitation, does not constitute the offense (People v. Gates, 46 Cal. 53). The judgment being void, the imprisonment is necessarily unlawful, and the prisoner must be discharged. It is so ordered.

QUINT v. HOFFMAN et al. (No. 18,306.)[1]

IRRIGATION DISTRICT — COLLATERAL ATTACK—EXCESSIVE LEVY OF ASSESSMENTS — VALIDITY—INJUNCTION AGAINST COLLECTION—WHEN REFUSED.

1. The organization of an irrigation district cannot be collaterally attacked in an action by landowners to enjoin the collection of assessments by the officers of the district.

2. Under the Wright act (section 22), which provides that the board of directors of an irrigation district shall levy an assessment "sufficient to raise the annual interest on the outstanding bonds" of the district, such board has no power to levy an assessment in excess of such an amount.

3. A landowner cannot enjoin the collection of an excessive levy of assessments by the board of directors of an irrigation district until he has paid the amount the board had the power to levy.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Glenn county; Seth Wellington, Judge.

Action by Herman Quint against George W. Hoffman and others, claiming to act as directors of the Central irrigation district, P. H. Graham, claiming to act as collector of such district, and others, to enjoin defendant Graham from selling lands for assessments levied in the year 1892. From an order dissolving a temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Maxwell, Maxwell & McEnerney, R. A. Long, G. D. Dudley, and Maxwell, Dorsey & Soto, for appellant. Johnson & Johnson and R. Percy Wright, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action commenced by the plaintiff to enjoin the defendant P. H. Graham, as collector of Central irrigation district, from selling any lands of the plaintiff, and of others similarly situated, for assessments levied in the year 1892. A temporary injunction was issued upon the filing of the complaint, which was subsequently dissolved upon the ground that the facts stated therein were not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded, and thereupon this appeal was taken from such order of dissolution. The only question presented by this appeal is, does the complaint state sufficient facts to entitle the plaintiff to a perpetual injunction?

1. The organization of the Central irrigation district is assailed, and it is insisted that the validity of that organization may be attacked collaterally in this proceeding by showing that the board of supervisors acted without their jurisdiction in effecting its organization. This position cannot be maintained. An irrigation district of this character is a public corporation, formed under a general law, and its object is the promotion of the general welfare. People v. Irrigation Dist., 98 Cal. 206, 32 Pac. 1047, and cases there cited. Corporations organized under the act of the legislature popularly known as the "Wright Act" being public corporations, it is immaterial whether they be corporations de jure or de facto. That is a matter which cannot be inquired into upon a collateral attack; and in a case like the present, where the validity of an assessment levied by such a corporation is the subject of litigation, the validity of such assessment does in no way rest upon the fact of the de jure character of the corporation. This principle must be considered settled law in this state. Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 411; Reclamation Dist. v. Gray, 95 Cal. 601, 30 Pac. 779; Swamp-Land Dist. v. Silver, 98 Cal. 53, 32 Pac. 866. If appellant's contention goes to the extent that this corporation is not even a corporation de facto, the allegations of the complaint are not sufficient to support such contention.

2. It is insisted that plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought, upon the ground that the levy of the tax was at a rate greater than is authorized by the Wright act. This assessment was levied under section 22 of that act, which provides that "the board of directors shall then levy an assessment sufficient to raise the annual interest on the outstanding bonds." In pursuance of this provision the board of directors made, and had entered upon its minutes, the following order: "The assessment book of Central irrigation district for the year 1892-3 having been completed, and the assessments of property therein having been equalized, and it appearing therefrom that the total assessed value of property in said district for the year 1892-3 is the sum of $2,643,217, the board of directors proceed to consider the amount required to be raised in order to meet the annual interest on bonds of said district during said year. After due deliberation thereon, it is ordered by the said board of directors of said Central irrigation district that an assessment be, and the same is hereby, levied and ordered collected on each $100 assessed valuation of property in said Central irrigation district, for district purposes aforesaid, for the fiscal year 1892-3, as follows, to wit: for bond fund, $1.55 on each $100; total levy of assessment for the purpose before mentioned, $1.55 on each $100." The bonds issued by and outstanding against the district amounted to $574,000, and the amount of money necessary to be raised to pay the interest upon said bonds, at the rate fixed by the act itself, would be $34,440; yet the amount which would be raised under the aforesaid levy would exceed that sum by more than $5,000. While the views we entertain upon another branch of the case prevent plaintiff from securing the relief in this action desired, still the question here presented as to the true construction of section 22 of the Wright act may be said to be directly involved in a proper solution of this litigation, and the question is not only a new one, but one so important to both taxpayers and corporations that we deem it advisable to consider it at the present time, in order that these district corporations, in the future, may so shape their course as to keep within their powers under the law. This board of directors is a creature of the statute, and it can do nothing unless authorized by the statute. Its powers are limited, special, and express, and it can assume no power by inference or implication. It exceeded its power in making a levy of $1.55 upon the $100. The statute says it had the power, and it was its duty, to levy an assessment sufficient to pay the annual interest. But it exceeded its power by levying an assessment largely in excess of that amount. By this section of the act, certain burdens only could be cast upon the land of the taxpayers of the district, and they had the right to insist upon a rigid compliance with this provision of the statute, and that no additional burdens be had, for it is the only section of the act providing for the levying of a tax and the raising of money regardless of the advice or wishes of the parties who are called upon to pay that tax. Money raised under this section of the act can be applied to but one single purpose. The law contemplates no other application of it. Again, the interest upon the bonds must be paid semiannually, and the amount to be raised is a matter of exact mathematical computation. The tax is levied upon the real estate of the district, and, when the assessment has been made and equalized, it would seem the rate to be levied is a matter readily ascertainable. The board has no right to assume that the tax upon any particular tract of land will not be paid by the owner, or by a sale of the land itself. The question of the amount to be raised is not one of discretion, but of pure legal right. If the board could fix the rate at $1.55 per $100, it would have the same right to double that rate, and thus entirely disregard its statutory authority. This it cannot do. In acting under this section, as well as its conduct of all other affairs of the district, it must ever keep its eye upon the statute. The statute furnishes the only road upon which it may safely travel. All others not only lead to danger, but their use is forbidden to it by the law. It is evident in the present case that the board adopted the course laid down in section 41 of the act, and deducted 15 per cent. from the assessment roll for anticipated delinquencies. But the error of the board lies in the fact that the provisions of section 41 are not applicable to section 22. Neither does section 22 contain any authority for a deduction based upon anticipated delinquencies. The lawmaking power, in enacting section 41, appeared to recognize the fact that special authority was necessary to justify the course followed in fixing the rate as there declared; but, whether the omission to insert a similar provision in section 22 was intentional or not, it is not our province to decide. Certainly, no good reason is apparent why the provision, if a salutary and necessary one, should be found in section 41, where small amounts of money are contemplated to be raised by taxation, and be absent from section 22, which not only provides for the payment of interest upon all bonds issued, but for the payment of the bonds themselves. It cannot be held that a judicial discretion is vested in the board of directors to fix the levy at any rate which it might deem sufficient to raise the amount necessary to pay the annual interest. The legislature has no power to vest a board with any such discretion. Such a construction of the provision would render it unconstitutional. The principle here involved was directly adjudicated upon in the case of Houghton v. Austin, 47 Cal., at page 652. It was there held that the legislature could not delegate this power to any board or person. The provision of the statute then under consideration provided that the state board of equalization, after allowing for delinquencies in the collection of the taxes, should fix a rate sufficient to raise the amount of revenue directed by the legislature. It was held in that case that the board had no authority to make any estimate for delinquencies in collection. In the act under present investigation, there is not even an attempt of the legislature to clothe the board with authority to take into consideration, in making the levy, any question as to anticipated delinquencies. For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the board of directors exceeded its power in fixing the rate at $1.55 upon the $100.

3. Notwithstanding the levy was in excess of the power of the board, and the tax was more than plaintiff could be compelled to pay, still he owed the district a portion of the tax levy, upon his own showing; and he will not be heard, in a court of equity, until he has paid the amount the board had the power to levy upon his land. The amount which he honestly owes the district was readily ascertainable, and he should have paid it. It was a matter of computation equally as exact as the computation showing that the levy was at too high a rate; and upon the elementary principle that, if a part of a tax is valid and authorized, such portion must be paid before a party will be allowed to come into a court of equity to make complaint, we think plaintiff is entitled to no relief in this action. Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; Esterbrook v. O'Brien, 98 Cal. 671, 33 Pac. 765. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (No. 21,080.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1894.)

FORGERY—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. An indictment for passing a forged check, which fails to state that defendant knew the same was forged, is defective.

2. Where forgery of a check is charged in the first count of an indictment, and the passing of it is charged in the second, the allegations of the first count cannot be read with the second, for the purpose of supplying a defect therein.

3. Where, on the trial of an indictment containing two counts, one of which is defective, evidence pertinent to both is received under a ruling that both are good, a verdict will not be sustained because the evidence is sufficient to sustain a conviction on the count which is good.

4. Where an indictment for forgery charges that the name forged was "R. S. S.," proof that the name was "R. G. S." is sufficient, as the middle initial of a name is not material.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

S. A. Smith was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Reversed.

A. M. Johnson, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. Defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. There were two counts in the information filed against him. In the first it is charged that he did on or about November 6, 1893, willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously, and with intent then and there to defraud, prejudice, and damage R. S. Southerland and the Santa Rosa Bank (a corporation, etc.), falsely make, forge, and counterfeit a certain check, in the words and figures as follows, to wit: "Santa Rosa, Cal., Nov. 6, 1893. No. 191. Santa Rosa Bank, pay to John W. Fields, or bearer, $17.50 dollars. R. S. Southerland. [Indorsed] J. W. Fields." The second count charges that defendant did thereafter, and on the 8th day of November, 1893, "utter, publish, and pass, as true and genuine, a certain forged, false, and counterfeit check, which said check was the same check referred to in the first count of this information, which check is in the words and figures as follows [then follows a copy of the check, precisely as in the first count], with intent thereby to prejudice, damage, and defraud the said R. S. Southerland and the said Santa Rosa Bank." The information closes in the usual form. It will be perceived the second count fails to aver that the defendant passed as true the check, "knowing the same to be false," etc., as specified in section 470 of the Penal Code. No objection was taken to the information, by demurrer or otherwise. At the trial, defendant, by his counsel, objected to evidence under the second count of the information, upon the ground that said second count did not state a public offense, in that there was no allegation that defendant knew the check was forged. The objection was overruled, and an exception noted. Evidence was received upon said second count. The ruling of the court admitting such evidence is assigned as error.

To constitute forgery by uttering or passing of a forged instrument, as defined in section 470 of the Penal Code, three important factors are requisite: (1) It must be uttered, published, passed, or attempted to be passed, as true and genuine; (2) it must be known by the person uttering or passing it to be false, altered, forged, or counterfeited; (3) it must be with intent to prejudice, damage, or defraud some person. These three essential elements going to constitute the crime must all be present, and must all be substantially charged in the indictment or information. In the present information the second prerequisite, viz. knowledge on the part of defendant of its falsity, is not charged. The contention of the respondent is that the clause in the second count of the information, that the "said check was the same check referred to in the first count of this information," is such a reference to the first count as serves to incorporate its allegations in the second count, and hence that the second count is sufficient. The language used will bear no such construction. Its object is apparent. Either to forge a check, or to pass it with guilty knowledge, etc., is a forgery. Each may be charged singly as constituting the crime, or, if charged together, they constitute but one offense. A single offense may be charged in separate counts without being amenable to the objection of charging more than one offense, to do which is interdicted by our Penal Code. In People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394, it was held that where the forgery of a check was charged in one count, and the passing of a check in another count, they would not be presumed to be the same instrument or to constitute the same offense, even though copies of the check were set out in each count, and were alike verbatim et literatim. Since that decision, it has been the practice in criminal pleading, in such cases, to use apt expressions showing that the offense specified under different statements or counts is one and the same. The expression quoted from the second count of the information serves to fill this office of showing the offense to be the same as that specified in the first count, and nothing more. It follows that the second count of the information failed to state an offense, and the proffered testimony relating thereto should have been rejected. This was a defect which was not waived by a failure to demur, but one which went to the very essence of the cause of action, and which might be raised at any point in the progress of the case. Pen. Code, § 1012. Some of this testimony was no doubt admissible in support of the first count of the information. The possession of an instrument recently forged, by one claiming under it, like the possession of goods recently stolen, is evidence against the possessor. So, too, the declaration of the defendant that he had worked for Southerland; that the latter had no money to pay him, and had given him the check, etc.,—was admissible under the charge of forgery. Com. v. Talbot, 2 Allen, 161. But when it was admitted as evidence of uttering and passing as genuine under the second count, and when the court refused the instruction of defendant that the second count of the information charged no offense, and that defendant could not be convicted thereunder, it was manifest error. It may be claimed that, conceding the error, there was one good count in the information, with ample evidence in its support, and hence that the judgment is supported by the good count, and will not be reversed. At common law it was held that where an indictment contained two counts, and at a trial no evidence was introduced in favor of one of them, a general verdict and judgment would be upheld upon the ground that the presumption will prevail that the judgment of the nisi prius court was rendered upon the good count, and not upon the unsupported one. This case differs materially from those involving that question. Here there are two counts,—one good and the other bad. The court holds them both good. There is a verdict of guilty upon both counts, upon which judgment is pronounced. Error has intervened, and the good cannot be separated from the bad. The presumption must be that as both were held good, and evidence introduced in support of both, the judgment is upon both, and hence that it is erroneous. See People v. Mitchell, 92 Cal. 590, 28 Pac. 597. For this error the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial had, or the information set aside and a new information filed, as the court below may determine.

There is another question raised by appellant which may come up on a second trial, and which will be briefly noticed. The information charged the defendant with forging a check, signed R. S. Southerland, with intent to defraud R. S. Southerland and the Santa Rosa Bank. The testimony at the trial showed that "R. G. Southerland" was the true name of the party whose name was sought to be forged, and appellant claims the variance was fatal. (1) At common law the name of an individual consists presumptively of one Christian, baptismal, or given name, and also one surname, family name, or patronymic. (2) The common law recognized but one Christian name. Hence, the middle name or names, or the middle initial letter or letters, of a person's name, are not material, either in civil or criminal proceedings; and a variance between the pleading and proof in respect to such middle names or initials is, in this country, as at common law, regarded as immaterial. Massachusetts is an exception to this rule. People v. Ferris, 56 Cal. 442; People v. Lockwood, 6 Cal. 205; People v. Boggs, 20 Cal. 433; Miller v. People, 39 Ill. 457; Tucker v. People, 122 Ill. 583, 13 N. E. 809; Langdon v. People, 133 Ill. 382, 24 N. E. 874; State v. Smith, 12 Ark. 622. The identity of R. G. Southerland as the party intended in the forged instrument was complete. There was no error in the admission of evidence or instructions under this head.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial had, or the information set aside, and a new information filed, as the court below may determine.

PEOPLE v. LANDMAN. (No. 21,115.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTION OF INTENT—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL.

1. On a trial for assault with intent to murder, a charge that, if defendant voluntarily assaulted the prosecuting witness with a deadly weapon, in such manner that the natural consequences would be the death of the witness, then the law presumes that the defendant intended to kill the witness, is error, as the question of intent is one of fact, to be decided by the jury.

2. In order to convict of assault with intent to kill, the facts proven must be such that if death had resulted from the assault the same would have been murder.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Gustave Landman was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and appeals. Reversed.

Daney & Wright, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of an assault with intent to commit murder, and now prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. At the request of the prosecution the court gave the jury the following instruction: "Every person is presumed to intend what his acts indicate his intention to have been; and if the defendant, at the time and place alleged in the information, voluntarily assaulted the prosecuting witness with a deadly weapon, in such a manner that the natural and ordinary consequences of such assault would be to kill the said witness, Stanovitch, then the law presumes that the defendant intended to kill the said witness, Stanovitch; and, unless it appears from the evidence that the intention of the defendant was other than his acts indicated, the law will not hold him guiltless." It is now argued by the attorney general that the foregoing instruction should not be construed as an attempted exposition of the law bearing upon the specific offense charged in the information, but that it related and was pertinent to other and lower offenses necessarily included therein, and that as to such offenses it stated the true rule. To support his contention he says the "intent" to which the instruction was directed was "the intent to kill," and not the "intent to murder." Again, he says the word "guiltless" does not refer to the offense of assault with intent to commit murder, but that such portion of the instruction means that the defendant will not be held guiltless of any and all offenses. We think the argument unsound. In the first place, there is no such offense designated in our Criminal Code as an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill. The entire instruction is framed with a view of enlightening the jury upon a question of law as to the intent to kill; and, upon respondent's construction, it would be uncalled for and not demanded by the exigencies of the case, for an intent to kill is only material in this case when we view such an intent as one to commit murder. Again, the fair interpretation of the language of the court is that, under the circumstances depicted by the evidence stated, the defendant could not be held guiltless of the specified crime charged in the information. A jury would so understand it beyond any doubt. Looking at the instruction from this standpoint, it is clearly erroneous, for it trenches upon the province of the jury in passing upon matters of fact. In the offense here charged a specific intent is the all-important element, and it is essentially a question of fact for the jury to decide. When a specific intent is an element of the offense, no presumption of law can ever arise that will decide this question of intent, and therein is found the vice of the present instruction. The saving clause found in the latter portion of it does not cure the objection we have suggested. If it serves any purpose whatever, it casts upon the defendant the burden of introducing evidence to disprove a state of facts created by a presumption of law, and no such burden can be cast upon a defendant in a case charging an offense of the present character. Of course, under these circumstances, a person's intent cannot be proven by direct and positive evidence, yet it is none the less a question of fact, to be proven like any other fact in the case, and all the circumstances surrounding the assault furnish the rule upon which its proper solution depends. As fully and entirely supporting these views, we cite Roberts v. People, 19 Mich. 401; Patterson v. State, 85 Ga. 131, 11 S. E. 620; Lawson, Pres. Ev. p. 271; People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 42, 22 Pac. 80.

The court refused to give the following instruction asked by the defendant: "In order to justify a verdict of guilty of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, the facts and circumstances proven in a case must be such that if death had resulted from the shooting the crime would have been murder, and not manslaughter; for if the crime, in a case of death, would have been only manslaughter, the defendant cannot be convicted of the offense charged." This instruction should have been given, for it is sound law. If death should result from an assault with intent to commit murder, no case can be imagined where the assailant would not be guilty of the crime of murder. Indeed, the death of the party assaulted is the only element necessary to change the offense from assault with intent to commit murder to that of murder. It may be suggested that the converse of this principle does not necessarily follow, to wit, if the killing is murder there must necessarily have been an intent to commit murder. See People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 42, 22 Pac. 80. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

RAMBOZ v. STOWELL. (No. 19,345.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1894.)

ESTOPPEL BY DEED.

Where a married woman represents that she is a widow, and, for a valuable consideration, executes a deed of land as a single woman, and after her husband's death, without consideration, deeds the land to her daughter, who has actual notice of the prior deed, the daughter is estopped from denying that her mother was a widow when the prior deed was executed.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by Jane Ramboz against N. W. Stowell to quiet title to land. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Matthews and C. C. Stephens, for appellant. Wm. D. Stephens, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet title to a lot of land in the city of Los Angeles. It is admitted that Margaret J. Starkey was the owner of the lot in question on June 13, 1878, as her separate property, and both parties claim title from her. On that day, Mrs. Starkey, for a valuable and sufficient consideration, signed, sealed, and delivered to Helen L. Grinnell a deed of the lot, the acknowledgment of the execution of which was certified by a notary public (A. C. Holmes) in the form required for an unmarried woman, and not otherwise, and the deed was recorded on the same day. On September 19, 1887, Helen L. Grinnell, in consideration of $11,000, conveyed the lot to defendant by deed recorded October 4, 1887. On May 13, 1891, Mrs. Starkey, for the nominal consideration of $100, but without any valuable consideration, conveyed the lot to plaintiff, who is her daughter, and who, on the following day (May 14, 1891), commenced this action. At the date of the deed to plaintiff she had actual notice of the prior deed of her mother to Helen L. Grinnell. The trial court gave judgment for defendant upon a finding that the plaintiff was estopped from denying that Mrs. Starkey was a widow at the time she acknowledged her deed to Helen L. Grinnell; and whether or not this finding is supported by the pleadings, and is justified by the evidence, are the only questions requiring special consideration.

That the answer states facts sufficient to constitute an estoppel, within the rule deducible from the cases of Reis v. Lawrence, 63 Cal. 129, and Hand v. Hand, 68 Cal. 135, 8 Pac. 705, I have no doubt.

As to the sufficiency of the evidence, it is admitted that Mrs. Starkey was married to Thomas Starkey, in Ohio, in 1844; that she and her husband lived together until some time in 1869, when they separated at Chicago, Ill.; that in 1870 she came to Los Angeles, in this state, where she continuously resided until 1880, except that in 1877 she visited Chicago for about three weeks, and there met her husband, who remained with her during that visit; that her husband was never in this state; and that he died in 1885. It also appears that she went to Arizona in 1880, and returned to Los Angeles in 1884, where she has ever since remained. The court found that she abandoned and deserted her husband in the state of Illinois in 1869, and this finding seems fairly inferable from the admitted fact that she left him in that state, there being no evidence that he ever left or deserted her. J. S. Severance testified, in substance, that during the year 1878 he was agent for Helen L. Grinnell, who then and ever since resided in New York; that, as such agent, he attended to and conducted the transfer of the premises in question from Mrs. Starkey to Helen L. Grinnell, which was consummated by the acknowledgment of the deed on June 13, 1878; that during the negotiations for that transfer, and before the acknowledgment of the deed, Mrs. Starkey told him that she was a widow, and in a previous transaction with her she had expressly represented herself to be a widow; and that he never had any notice that she was a married woman at the time she executed the deed to Helen L. Grinnell, until since the commencement of this action. A. C. Holmes, the notary by whom the acknowledgment was certified, testified that, in taking acknowledgments of women, it had been his invariable custom to ask them whether or not they were married, and to take and certify their acknowledgments accordingly, and that, from the form in which he had certified the acknowledgment of Mrs. Starkey, he was positive that she must have informed him that she was not married; otherwise, he would have drawn the certificate in the form required by law for married women, and would not have drawn it in the form in which it is. Of all this he was very positive, although he did not remember that particular transaction. Then, to prove that Mrs. Starkey had generally represented herself to the public as a widow, other witnesses were called and examined, as follows: G. W. Gillette testified that, while he was county recorder, in 1875, Mrs. Starkey acknowledged a mortgage before him, in the body of which she was described as "a widow," and in the certificate of acknowledgment he had certified that she "declared herself to be a widow," and that he would not have so certified if she had not so declared, but that, independently of the record, he had no very distinct recollection of the particular transaction. J. J. Warner, who was a notary in 1876, testified that in that year Mrs. Starkey acknowledged a deed before him, in the certificate of her acknowledgment of the execution of which he had described her as "a widow;" that, although he had no recollection of having so described her, "the word 'widow' could not have been inserted in the certificate unless the party making the acknowledgment had told me, then and there, that she was a widow." E. H. Owen testified that, as deputy county clerk, he had taken the acknowledgment of Mrs. Starkey to the execution of a deed in 1875, certified in the form required for unmarried women, and that he would not have taken it in that form without having asked her the question whether she was married or not. Messrs. Gillette, Severance, and Owen each testified that he had done considerable business with and for Mrs. Starkey, and had been well acquainted with her, and had always understood, from what she said or did, that she was a widow. In rebuttal of the foregoing, Mrs. Starkey flatly denied that she had ever in any manner represented herself to be a widow or unmarried prior to the death of her husband. Horace Hall, who had acted as attorney for Mrs. Starkey, testified that in 1877 or 1878 she sold a lot to Mrs. Osterman, and during the transaction the attorney for Mrs. Osterman asked her whether she was a widow or a married woman, and she answered that "she did not know whether she was wife or widow; that her husband disappeared some years before, and she did not know whether he was living or dead." Mrs. Mary Hall testified that she had taken a deed from Mrs. Starkey in 1876, and that Mrs. Starkey never represented to her that she was a widow, but always told her that she was married. There is no evidence, however, that either Mr. or Mrs. Hall ever communicated the facts to which they testified to any other person, nor does it appear how the deeds referred to by them were acknowledged, or that Mrs. Starkey ever acknowledged any instrument as a married woman. I think the evidence for defendant tended to prove that, before and at the time she executed the deed to Helen L. Grinnell, Mrs. Starkey falsely represented to Severance, the agent of Grinnell, that she was unmarried, intending thereby to deceive them, and that they and the defendant acted upon such representations, believing them to be true, not only in paying the purchase money, but in paying all the taxes and street assessments during the period of 13 years immediately prior to the commencement of this action, and without notice of the falsity of the representations, or that Mrs. Starkey intended to lay any claim to the land. The evidence of intentional misrepresentation is considerably stronger than in the case of Reis v. Lawrence, supra, wherein there appeared to be no reason to doubt that Mrs. Lawrence honestly believed that she had been divorced from her husband.

Certain evidence objected to by plaintiff's counsel was admitted temporarily, with the understanding that the court would pass upon the objections before judgment, and it appears that the court did not afterwards expressly decide whether the evidence objected to was admissible or not; and this is assigned as error for which the judgment should be reversed. All the evidence thus admitted was either properly admissible or harmless; so that, even if the court erred in failing to decide the questions raised, the plaintiff could not have been injured thereby. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

In re MUERSING'S ESTATE. (No. 18,311.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1894.)

ADMINISTRATION—QUALIFICATIONS OF ADMINISTRATOR—PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1738, providing that the public administrator must not be interested in the expenditures on account of any estate he administers, does not disqualify a public administrator, who, before his appointment, furnished the coffin for deceased.

2. A nonresident is incompetent to nominate an administrator.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Application for letters of administration on the estate of H. W. Muersing, deceased. From an order denying his application, and appointing the public administrator, F. V. A. De Stuers appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Knox, for appellant. T. C. Law and W. A. Nygh, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. H. W. Muersing died intestate in the county of Merced, leaving an estate therein, but no relative resident of the state, his next of kin being his father, a nonresident. Two applications were made for letters of administration upon the estate,—one by A. G. Clough, as public administrator of the county; the other by one F. V. A. De Stuers, basing his right to administer upon the request and nomination of the father of deceased. The court appointed Clough, the public administrator, and denied the application of De Stuers, and the latter appeals from the order.

The point relied upon by appellant for a reversal of the order is the alleged incompetency of Clough, the public administrator, to administer upon the estate, by reason of the fact that he held a demand against the estate which would have to be paid during the course of administration. The fact upon which this objection was based, as disclosed by the evidence, was that the undertaking firm of Clough & Nordgren, in which the respondent, Clough, was a partner, had furnished the coffin and burial outfit for the deceased, for which they would have to be paid out of the estate. Appellant contends that, by reason of this fact, respondent is disqualified from administering the trust, and relies upon the provisions of section 1738 of the Code of Civil Procedure as sustaining this contention. But that section has no application. It provides that "the public administrator must not be interested in the expenditures of any kind made on account of any estate he administers, nor must he be associated in business or otherwise with any one who is so interested." It is apparent that this section does not undertake to state a rule of disqualification, but simply prescribes a very salutary rule of official conduct to govern the public administrator in the discharge of his duty, and prevent his trafficking to his advantage in the estate. It does not render incompetent as administrator one who, under the circumstances disclosed here, or otherwise, becomes a creditor of an estate before his appointment, but furnishes a ground upon which, for a violation of its provisions, the administrator would be subject to removal. There is nothing in this section, nor in the various other provisions of the Code relating to estates of deceased persons, which have been called to our attention, tending to sustain the theory that the mere fact of being a creditor of, or having a demand against, an estate, disqualifies one from appointment as administrator. Section 1369, Code Civ. Proc., prescribes the grounds which render one incompetent to serve as administrator, of which this is not one, and the courts have no right to add to the disqualifications prescribed by the legislature. In re Bauquier, 88 Cal. 312, 26 Pac. 178, 532, and cases there cited.

Appellant seems to have abandoned any claim of right to letters based upon the nomination of the father, since that feature of the case is mentioned only incidentally in his statement of facts, and is not recurred to in the points. If it is to be regarded as a point made in the case, however, there is nothing in it. The evidence shows that the father lives in Holland, and, upon the death of his son, sent a cablegram requesting the appointment of De Stuers as administrator of the estate. Conceding that this was an authorized way to make such request, and that it was properly before the court for consideration, it had no legal significance. The father, not being a resident of the state, was not competent or entitled to serve as administrator. Code Civ. Proc. § 1369. And, being incapable himself of administering, it was not competent for him to nominate an administrator. Estate of Beech, 63 Cal. 458; Estate of Kelly, 57 Cal. 81; Estate of Morgan, 53 Cal. 243. The court was therefore bound to disregard the request. Not being incompetent, the public administrator was entitled to letters, as against the appellant. Code Civ. Proc. § 1365. Order affirmed.

CURRIER v. HOWES et al. (No. 19,213.)

RIGHT OF WAY—LANDS BOUNDED BY ALLEY—EXTENT OF EASEMENT.

1. Where an owner of land lays off an alley extending into such land, marking its boundaries by fences, and conveys lots bordering thereon with an express grant of right of way through such alley, the rights of purchasers are presumed to extend to the limits of the alley so designated.

2. Where the owner of land establishes an alley extending across the rear of a lot subsequently conveyed, with a right of way "to and from said lot" through such alley, the right of way extends along the whole rear of such lot.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. Wade, Judge.

Action by A. T. Currier against F. C. Howes and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendants appealed. Affirmed.

Allen, Conrey & Miller, for appellants. Brunson, Wilson & Lamme, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to restrain the defendants from obstructing an alley or private way, and from taking or holding possession thereof, excavating therein, or erecting buildings thereon, etc., and to recover damages for injury thereto. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, written findings filed, and judgment rendered thereon in favor of the plaintiff for $10 as damages, and enjoining the defendants as prayed for in the complaint. The defendants appeal from the final judgment, and support their appeal by a bill of exceptions.

In 1866, George O. Tiffany was the owner in fee and possessed of certain land in Los Angeles, bounded on the north by Third street, on the east by Spring street, and on the west by Fort street (now known as "Broadway"), which land he subdivided and sold in lots to sundry persons. Either for his own convenience, or to enhance the price of lots, or from some other cause, said Tiffany laid out an alley 10 feet in width from Fort street, running east, and extending either to the rear of lot 13, or across the entire rear of lot 13, where it terminates in a cul de sac. In other words, it is a blind alley, open at one end only. Plaintiff and the defendants here, or some of them, are seised and possessed of lots in this tract of land, holding by sundry mesne conveyances under said Tiffany. As there is no question made in regard to the regularity of the chain of title from Tiffany to the parties herein, for brevity's sake it may be said plaintiff is seised of a lot or lots of land bounded on the north by Third street, and extending southerly to the line of the alley, under a deed executed May 16, 1874, by said Tiffany, which contains the following clause: "Also the right of passage by alley way ten (10) feet wide from Fort street to the rear of said lot for passage to and from said lot, but for no other purpose;" or, as contained in a deed from the same grantor, executed June 5, 1874, to remedy some supposed defect in the former deed: "This conveyance to include the right of passage of alleyway ten (10) feet wide from Fort street to the rear of the premises hereinbefore described for passage to and from, but for no other purpose." Defendants are seised and possessed under Tiffany, by conveyance executed October 12, 1876, of a lot or lots fronting on Spring street, and extending back west along the south line or rear of plaintiff's lot, and are the owners and holders of the fee of the alleyway. The several conveyances relating to title were duly recorded at or about the date of their execution. Defendants, about October, 1889, entered upon the east 40 to 45 feet of what is claimed to be the alleyway, and commenced the construction of a brick building thereon, which, if completed, will occupy the whole of the same along the rear or south line of plaintiff's lot, except 15 to 20 feet thereof at the southwest corner thereof.

The case, as presented, involves two principal questions: (1) The first being whether, as a matter of fact, the alleyway extended from Fort street, to and along the entire rear or south end of plaintiff's lot to the southeast corner, or whether it terminated at or near the southwesterly corner thereof. (2) As to the construction to be given to the clause in the deed of conveyance whereby plaintiff is granted the right of passage through the alley.

As to the first question it may be said that the allegation of the complaint is that the alley extends along the entire rear or south line of plaintiff's lot, which is 60 feet in width. The finding of the court sustains the allegation. This finding, like most of the others, is challenged by the defendants as not being sustained by the evidence. It must be admitted that the testimony in the case is more than usually indefinite and unsatisfactory. It would throw much light upon the case if it fixed the dates of facts more particularly. The testimony, as it is, tends to show that, commencing with 1872, Tiffany began to sell lots bounded by this alley, and continued so to do for, say, five years, during which time he sold all the land bordering on the alley in question, consisting of seven or eight lots, in all of which cases except two he granted a right of way through this alley by deed, and in the excepted cases he granted the fee to the alley, and in one of them such fee was granted subject to the easement. It also appears that the alley in rear of plaintiff's lot was fenced throughout and on both sides, from the southeast corner of plaintiff's lot to Fort street, prior to 1879 or 1880, but the time at which such fence was constructed does not appear. The plain inference is that it was so fenced, at least on the south side, by Tiffany, as the fact does appear that it was fenced when the land now owned by defendants vested in his immediate grantee under a mortgage in 1879, and the evidence tends to show that it has been bounded by fences ever since, except as to unimportant breaks. There was also testimony going to show that the alley has been used for the purposes of ingress and egress, and as a passageway, by the persons living along it, the defendants included. The evidence was sufficient to support the finding. There was certainly a substantial conflict in the evidence, and, as we are not authorized in such cases to disturb the findings of the court below, it can subserve no useful purpose to state the testimony of defendants, or to comment upon it. It has been held by this court that, where lots are laid off and sold as per a map fronting upon what purports to be a street, it amounts to a dedication of the street as to the purchasers. Stone v. Brooks, 35 Cal. 489; People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. 474; Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 Pac. 839. It must follow upon principle, that where the owner of land lays off an alley through, or extending into, said land, and designates its boundaries and extent by substantial fences, and conveys lots bordering upon such alley with an express grant of a right of way for egress and ingress through such alley, the rights of the purchasers will be presumed to extend to the limits of the alley thus designated.

2. As to the second proposition, the contention of the defendants and appellants is that the grant of a right of passageway for passage "to and from said lot" cannot be construed so as to grant a right of way "along" the whole length of the rear of the lot, when the language is "to and from" the rear.

Brossart v. Corlett, 27 Iowa, 288, and Somerset v. Railroad Co., 46 Law T. (N. S.) 883, are cited in support of this contention. The case last cited is not at hand. Brossart v. Corlett was a case in which one Lyon, the owner of certain lots in a block of land in Iowa City, sold a portion thereof, and conveyed with the following reservation to himself: "The said Lyon reserving to himself, his heirs and assigns, the right of way to and through said above-described premises for wagons and foot passengers, from Washington street to the eastern boundary of his (Lyon's) premises, situate on said lots 5 and 6, forever." The object of the action was to have a way opened over the land conveyed by Lyon, not only to the eastern boundary thereof, but along the line of his own land, and upon that conveyed. Defendant had judgment, and on appeal such judgment was affirmed. The court said: "The rule, we grant, is that an easement appurtenant to an estate is so to every part thereof, whatever the subdivision at the time or subsequently. But it is just as true that the servient estate is not to be burdened to a greater extent than was contemplated at the time of the creation of the easement." The court then proceeds to reason that in the light of the surrounding circumstances, one of which was the construction given by the parties to the reservation by their acts for 8 to 17 years, the language used must be, under the circumstances of that case, construed to mean "to the line of plaintiff's land," and not "along such line after reaching it." Dillon, C. J., dissented from the majority of the court. It will be observed that the above case was one in which the grantor reserved a right of way or easement in land conveyed by him, and that in such cases covenants and reservations in case of doubt are construed more strongly against the covenantor or grantor. The general principle is "that, if an easement becomes appurtenant to an estate, it follows every part of the estate, into whomsoever hands the same may come by purchase or descent." Washb. Easem. (4th Ed.) p. 42. And, where the owner of land to which a right of way is appurtenant sells or devises it in separate parcels to different persons, it is held that each of such persons acquires a right of way as appurtenant to his particular part of the land. Lansing v. Wiswell, 5 Denio, 213; Watson v. Bioren, 1 Serg. & R. 227; Codling v. Johnson, 9 Barn. & C. 933; Hill v. Miller, 3 Paige, 253. And if, as in this case, the easement is acquired by deed, no length of time of mere nonuser will operate to impair or defeat the right. Nothing short of a use by the owner of the premises over which it was granted, which is adverse to the enjoyment of such easement by the owner thereof, for the space of time requisite to create a prescriptive right, will destroy the right granted. Washb. Easem. (4th Ed.) pp. 717, 718, and cases cited.

The court having found that the alley in question, extending across the rear of the plaintiff's lot, was laid out by George O. Tiffany, the owner of all the land in question, "for the use and occupation of such persons as might thereafter purchase parts or portions of land fronting or bounded by said lane or alley," etc., and the said Tiffany having conveyed the lot owned by plaintiff with the right of ingress and egress, as hereinbefore specified, the conclusion is irresistible that plaintiff is entitled to ingress and egress to and along the entire rear line of the lot so conveyed, and that the attempt of defendants to construct a building upon a portion of such alley in rear of plaintiff's lot was in violation of his easement or right of way therein. Appellants claim that the testimony fails to show that the alley was laid out by Tiffany for the benefit of parties who should thereafter purchase lots bordering upon it. We may concede the point, and the fact remains that there was evidence to show that he laid out the alley for that or some other purpose, and having done so, and conveyed the abutting lots with a right of way through the alley, and the same result follows. It was there as a patent fact, and the right conveyed, in view of the facts, must be construed in favor of plaintiff to extend to it as such existent fact. There was evidence that at one time a chicken house about 15 feet by 10 was constructed upon the extreme easterly end of the alley by placing a roof upon the fences, and by a partition at the west end thereof, and that it was finally removed by the owner of the fee of the alley; but how long it remained cannot be determined from the testimony, as neither the date of its construction or removal is given. This was doubtless evidence tending to show that the land was not subject to an easement, but it was by no means conclusive. The same may be said of an orange or lemon tree, or both, said to have stood in the alley. There were three exceptions taken to the introduction of evidence, none of which are important, and, as they are not urged here by appellant, they need not be discussed. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HOWARD v. McCHESNEY. (No. 19,334.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 14, 1894.)

PROCESS — SERVICE OF SUMMONS BY PUBLICATION —SUFFICIENCY.

1. A decree of foreclosure is not void for insufficiency of the affidavit of a publication, to be for two months in a certain weekly newspaper, where the affidavit stated that the summons was published therein every week and weekly for more than two months from the 26th day of November, 1891, to the 11th day of February, 1892, although the affidavit also contains a statement of publication on each seventh day between the two dates except one; the previous direct statement not being overcome by the subsequent statement.

2. It was competent for the court to allow in evidence a second affidavit showing that publication was made on the date omitted in the enumeration made in the first affidavit.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Proceeding by Bryant Howard against J. H. McChesney to set aside a decree of foreclosure entered against him by default. From an order denying the motion to set aside such decree, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. Hendrick, for appellant. E. W. Britt, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, McChesney, from an order denying his motion to set aside a decree of foreclosure entered against him by default. His motion is not based upon section 473, Code Civ. Proc. He does not ask to be allowed to answer to the merits. It was not made until more than a year after the rendition of the judgment. It rests entirely upon the theory that the judgment is absolutely void, and could, therefore, be set aside at any time on motion. Service was had on appellant by publication, and he bases his contention that the judgment is void upon the ground of the insufficiency of the affidavit of publication made before the entry of the decree, and attached to the judgment roll. The publication was, by the order of the court, to be for two months in a certain weekly newspaper; and the affidavit stated that the summons was published in said newspaper every week and weekly "for the period of more than two months from the 26th day of November, 1891, to the 11th day of February, 1892, viz." Then follows a statement of each seventh day between said two dates, except that the 21st of January, 1892,—a regular day for the issuance of said paper,—was omitted from the enumeration. The omission of that day is the only alleged defect in the affidavit. Before the motion to vacate was heard, the court allowed the person who made the first affidavit to file a second one, which showed that publication was made on said January 21st. The order must be affirmed. The judgment is not void on its face. It contains a recital of due service, and there is nothing in the record inconsistent with such recital. The previous direct statement in the affidavit that summons was published each week for two months between two named dates is not overcome and rendered valueless by the subsequent statement under a videlicit. The most that can be said about the affidavit is that it is ambiguous. That which follows a videlicet does not destroy that which precedes it. The general rule, rather, is that, if repugnant to the preceding matter, it will be rejected. Brown v. Berry, 47 Ill. 177; 2 Abb. Law Dict. 447, 635. Moreover, the court clearly had the right to allow in evidence the second affidavit which cleared away any possible doubt which there might be about the meaning of the first. See Herman v. Santee (decided August 13th by department 1 of this court) 37 Pac. 509, and cases there cited. The order appealed from is affirmed.

QUILL v. JACOBY et al. (No. 19,330.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1894.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—PERFORMANCE.

1. In an action to rescind a contract for the sale of land, which provided that the grantor was to build a levee along a river, whether the levee was completed within a reasonable time is a question for the court sitting as a jury; and, in the absence of any proof of damages to the grantee from failure to complete the same a finding that it was completed within a reasonable time will not be disturbed, though the work was not completed for four years.

2. Where a contract for the conveyance of land facing on a street provides that a levee shall be constructed on the "west side of the said tract" which side faces a street, the construction of the levee in the center of the street is a compliance with the provision.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by James Quill against A. Jacoby and another. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. C. Hester, for appellant. Graff & Latham, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. On the 13th day of July, 1887, James Quill, the plaintiff and appellant herein, entered into two written contracts with A. Jacoby and L. Thorn, the defendants and respondents, by each of which the plaintiff agreed to purchase, and the defendants to sell and convey, a specified lot in the "Jacoby and Thorn Subdivision," in the city of Los Angeles. For one lot appellant was to pay $800,—$300 down, and the remainder in two equal payments of $250 each, at six and twelve months, respectively. For the other lot he was to pay $700 in three equal installments,—one at the date of the execution of the contract, and the others at six and twelve months, respectively. One of the lots was designated as "Lot 4," and the other as "Lot 3," both in block L of said tract. The deferred payments were to bear 10 per cent. interest per annum. The contracts were identical in date and form, except as to description of lots and the amounts of payment. Respondents were to convey the lots to appellant upon payment of the final installment of the purchase price. The contract contained the following further stipulation: That respondents would construct and build a levee along the west side of said tract, in accordance with the plans and specifications as furnished by the council of the city of Los Angeles, and, if the last payment hereinbefore provided for should grow due before said levee has been accepted by the city as completed, then the last payment above referred to shall be deferred until said levee has been accepted by the proper officers of Los Angeles city, but shall be immediately due and payable on the acceptance of said work by the authorities of the city of Los Angeles." The agreement further provided that completion of the levee at an earlier date should not cause the last payment to become due before the expiration of the year from the date of the agreement as therein specified. Appellant made the payments, except the last, which was postponed until January 6, 1891, by reason of the nonconstruction of the levee, at which last-mentioned date appellant served upon respondents a written offer to relinquish and transfer to them all his interest in the lots under the contract, and demanded a repayment of the money by him paid on account of the contracts, specifying the sums so paid, which being refused, this action was brought to recover the money thus paid, aggregating $1,107 and interest.

Defendants in their original answer admitted the levee was not constructed; averred that a reasonable time for the construction thereof had not elapsed; averred that it was impracticable to construct such levee until its continuation above and along Los Angeles river was built; averred their willingness to construct it as soon as the connections could be made; averred a contract between the city of Los Angeles and a railroad company, by which the latter was engaged in building the whole of the levee in question, including that along the west side of the lots. The answer also denied an offer to rescind, retransfer, etc. By a supplemental answer defendants averred the completion and acceptance of the levee on or before April 11, 1892. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and written findings filed, upon which judgment was entered in favor of the defendants for costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The eighth finding of the court, which involves the main question in the case, is as follows: "That the levee along the west side of said tract, in accordance with the plans and specifications as furnished by the council of the city of Los Angeles, is fully completed, and was in process of completion prior to the 1st day of January, 1891; and the commencement of the construction of said levee and the completion thereof were within a reasonable time after the making of said contract by and between the plaintiff and defendants." The objections made to this finding are: (1) That the evidence shows that no levee has ever been made along the west side of the tract mentioned in the contracts; (2) that the evidence and pleadings show that prior to January 6, 1891, no levee had been commenced along the west side of said tract; (3) that the evidence shows that nearly four years elapsed after contract made before completion of levee, and that it could have been built in three months. It appears from the evidence that the land agreed to be conveyed to plaintiff lies on the east side of the Los Angeles river, fronting upon a street or boulevard of, say, 100 feet in width, running between it and the river; that a levee in front of lot 3, in block L (lot 4 being in the rear of lot 3, and not fronting on the boulevard), would be of no avail to keep out the water of the river unless continued up the river, say, one mile; that about the time of the execution of the agreement a plan was devised for the construction of the levee by property owners in interest, and a contract was let for the work, under which a levee was constructed from the upper end to within about 3,000 feet of this tract, when the work ceased from the difficulty in getting timber and lumber. Defendants afterwards sought to obtain the necessary timber and lumber, but failed to do so. They subsequently agreed with the Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company that the latter should construct the embankment or levee, and have and use it as a roadbed for its railway. The embankment is from 8 to 10 feet high. The exact time of its construction in front of plaintiff's lot only appears inferentially from the testimony of H. F. Stafford, as engineer and a witness for plaintiff, who says that on the 24th of September, 1891, he "made a survey of the land and of the levee that has been constructed by the Terminal Railroad along that portion of the subdivision showing blocks * * * and L., as the same is delineated on the map." It was therefore constructed prior to September 24, 1891. It will be observed that the agreement specified no time within which the levee was to be built. If constructed within the year, it did not hasten the date of the last payment for the land; but, if not constructed and accepted within the year, the effect of the delay was to defer such last payment until the levee was completed and accepted by the city of Los Angeles. What was a reasonable time for the construction of the levee (conceding that question to be involved) depended largely upon the magnitude and character of the work to be performed, and all the surrounding circumstances. The facts entering into the question were peculiarly within the province of a jury, or the court sitting as such, and in the absence of any allegation or proof of advantages which would have accrued to appellant, by an earlier construction of the levee, or of damage to him by the delay, we are not prepared to say that the finding of the court is contrary to the evidence. Non constat but that the fact that the last payment was deferred until the levee was completed may have fully compensated appellant for the delay.

The objection that the finding that the levee was "in process of completion prior to the date of the rescission of the contract by appellant" is contrary to the admission of the answer, and the evidence is technically correct. The answer admits that defendants had not commenced the construction of the levee, but avers that the railroad company had commenced building it on the 10th day of November, 1890, and had been continuously engaged thereat up to the time of answer, all of which it averred was well known to plaintiff, and in the supplemental answer they aver its completion. No part of it in front of the lots in question had been constructed up to January, 1891. The further objection that no part of the levee was ever constructed "along the west side of said tract" is without merit. Appellant contends that it should have been along the west line of the "boulevard," whereas in fact it was in front of lot 3, and on or near the center of the boulevard. Lot 3, as indicated on the map referred to in the agreement, lies on the east side of, and fronts on, the boulevard. We may indulge the presumption that a conveyance of the lot will include the fee to the middle of the street, but know of no presumption under which it can be made to include the whole of the street. The embankment, being at this point apparently in the middle of the boulevard, must be on or near the line. The object of the levee was no doubt to protect the land from overflow from the river, and there is no suggestion that it is not efficacious to that result. The question whether or not the boulevard includes a portion of the river is one not raised by the pleadings, and, if raised, could cut no figure in the determination of the question involved here, for the reason that the failure of title, if any, is not of any land agreed to be conveyed. Upon the facts as found by the court, the conclusions of law are correct. Indeed, it may well be doubted whether, assuming the facts to be as stated in the complaint, a case is made under which plaintiff was authorized to rescind the contract. "Where the failure be but partial, leaving a distinct part as a subsisting and executed consideration, and leaving also to the other party his action for damages for the part not performed," a rescission cannot be had. Pars. Cont. (8th Ed.) p. 679. In Franklin v. Miller, 4 Adol. & E. 599, Littledale, J., says: "It is a clearly-recognized principle that if there is only a partial failure of performance by one party to a contract, for which there may be a compensation in damages, the contract is not put an end to." It would seem that, when the parties stipulated that the last payment upon the land should be deferred until the levee was constructed, they agreed upon the consequences which should follow a failure to construct the levee, and that in such a case, there having been no time specified within which it was to be constructed, the delay should not, unless greatly extended, give a right to a rescission. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

DISBARMENT OF ATTORNEY—WHEN GRANTED.

An application to disbar a lawyer for appropriating funds collected by him will not be entertained till the truth of the matter has been settled in a criminal prosecution, or in an action to recover the money. Wyatt v. Stephens (Cal.) 36 Pac. 586, followed.

Application to disbar H. H. Lowenthal, an attorney at law. Application denied.

J. D. Sullivan and Herbert Choyinsky, for relator.

PER CURIAM. This is an accusation against an attorney at law, charging him with a breach of professional duty to his client. After the filing of the accusation, it was considered by the court in connection with a similar charge against Stephens, and the citation was denied upon the grounds stated in the decision in that case. 36 Pac. 586. It seems, however, that, by some inadvertence, no order has been formally entered in this case. Citation denied.

WOODRUFF et al. v. PERRY et al. (No. 19,405.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1894.)

IRRIGATION TAX—VOID ASSESSMENT — ENJOINING SALE.

Where an assessment for irrigation purposes is void because not authorized by vote of the electors of the district, a sale thereunder will be enjoined, as such invalidity would not appear in the tax deed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Woodruff and others against Wesley Perry and Otay Irrigation District to enjoin a sale under a tax levy. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, from which defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. H. Rippey and D. L. Withington, for appellants. D. L. Murdock, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The assessment referred to in the complaint, not having been authorized by a vote of the electors of the Otay Irrigation District, was illegal, under the rule announced in the case of Tregea v. Owens, 94 Cal. 317, 29 Pac. 643; and inasmuch as the invalidity of such assessment would not appear upon the face of the deed to be given the purchaser at the sale, on account of the tax levied by such assessment becoming delinquent, the plaintiffs are entitled to the injunction given by the judgment appealed from. Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127; Burr v. Hunt, 18 Cal. 303. Judgment affirmed.

ABBOTT v. 76 LAND & WATER CO. (No. 18,287.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1894.)

MALICIOUS CONVERSION—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A judgment for punitive damages, in an action for the malicious conversion of certain wheat, peaceably taken by defendant under a bona fide claim of title, and by the advice of reputable counsel, will be set aside, where the only evidence of malice is a statement made by defendant at the time,—that it was too rich for plaintiff to litigate with.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by O. L. Abbott against 76 Land & Water Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Goodfellow and L. L. Cory, for appellant. Thompson & Thompson and Geo. B. Graham, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Action to recover for the wrongful conversion by defendant of certain wheat alleged in the complaint to have been the property of plaintiff, and to have been of the value of $305. It is averred that the wheat was taken maliciously, and for the purpose of oppression. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $5,827, for which amount judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Of course all of the verdict over and above $305 (assuming the wheat to be of that value), and 7 per cent. per annum interest thereon, was for punitive damages, or smart money; and we see no evidence in the record warranting such a verdict, or any verdict at all, not confined to compensation for the actual detriment suffered by respondent on account of the conversion of the wheat. The admitted facts are that in December, 1885, appellant, being the owner of a certain tract of land, made a lease (or cropping contract) thereof to respondent for a term ending October, 1886. The lease granted the privilege of extending it for two years, and also an option to respondent to purchase the land at a certain price. Before the expiration of the first term a second lease was made by appellant to respondent, which did not state the option to purchase. Under this lease or cropping contract one-fifth of the wheat raised on the land annually was, when sacked, to be the property of the appellant. Respondent contended that under these leases he had the option of purchasing the land under the second lease. During the running of the second lease he offered to purchase the land at the price named in the first lease,—the land having greatly increased in value,—and appellant denied his right to purchase; and in July, 1888, respondent commenced an action to compel appellant to convey to him the said land. The action was decided in the trial court in favor of respondent, and was, upon appeal, affirmed by this court in January, 1891. 87 Cal. 323, 25 Pac. 693. In August, 1888, the appellant took the wheat sued for in this present action. It was taken from said leased or cropped land; appellant claiming to own it, as one-fifth of the wheat raised that year, and belonging to appellant. There is nothing to show that the appellant did not, in perfect good faith, litigate respondent's right to purchase the land from which the wheat was taken. He was advised by eminent counsel that respondent had not such right, and the question presented was one about which lawyers might well differ. See Abbott v. Water Co. (Cal.) 36 Pac. 1. And there was no evidence which justified the jury in finding that the act of taking the wheat was malicious, or done for the purpose of oppression. Appellant claimed, and in good faith, so far as it appears, that it owned the land and the wheat, and demanded it of respondent, who denied its right to take it, and forbade the removal of the wheat. Appellant's agents then went some distance, to the city of Fresno, to consult their counsel, who advised them what to do. He told them that the wheat belonged to appellant; that, if the wheat was taken away by respondent, appellant would lose its rent; that they should go and take the wheat, if they could do so peaceably, but not to use force; and that, if they could not get it peaceably, to come back, and he would commence legal proceedings. Acting on this advice, appellant's agents went to the land on another day, and, no other person being present, they took the wheat. No threats, violence, or force was used. Of course, as the litigation about the option to purchase the land terminated long afterwards in favor of respondent, appellant is liable for the value of the wheat taken; but the verdict is, confessedly, for over $5,000 more than such value. The respondent testified that, when he was about to commence his action to enforce his right to purchase the land, one of the officers of the appellant said to him that the appellant was too rich for him to litigate with; and this item of testimony seems to be about the only basis of a verdict for nearly 20 times the amount of the detriment suffered by respondent. There was some evidence erroneously admitted as to certain matters occurring long after the taking of the wheat, and with reference to differences between the parties about other property; but even that evidence, if it had been properly admitted, would not have justified the verdict in this case. As to the act of taking the wheat, upon which this present action is founded,—to which alone the evidence should have been confined,—there is nothing in the record to warrant the jury in finding that it was not done under a bona fide claim of right, and without malice or oppression. Respondent was therefore entitled only to compensation for the conversion. Indeed, the verdict was in the teeth of the following instruction given in the trial court: "You are further instructed that the defendant had a perfect legal right to rely on the advice of its attorneys, and that if you find from the evidence that P. D. Wigginton was a reputable attorney in the state of California, and he gave certain advice to the defendant corporation, which it followed in good faith, and that in so following such advice the defendant took the wheat as shown by the evidence, then in that event the defendant did not act maliciously, and the plaintiff can recover of the defendant only the actual damage suffered by reason of the conversion." See Selden v. Cashman, 20 Cal. 57; Dorsey v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 553; Phelps v. Owens, 11 Cal. 23. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

JOHNSON v. YUBA COUNTY. (No. 18,290.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1894.)

ELECTION—LIST OF NOMINATIONS—PUBLICATION—STATUTE—CONSTRUCTION—EXPENSE — LIABILITY OF COUNTY—ACTION—PLEADING.

1. Pol. Code, § 1194, as amended by Act March 20, 1891, p. 168, provides that at least 10 days before an election the county clerk shall publish in two newspapers the nominations to office certified to him by the secretary of state, and those filed with him; that he shall make not less than two publications before election day, one being on the last day the paper is issued before election day; and that the list of nominations published shall be arranged in the order and form in which they will be printed on the ballot. Held, that the statute does not require the publication of a separate list of nominations for each political subdivision of the county having offices to fill, but requires only the publication of one general list.

2. The cost of such publication is a county charge.

3. In an action against a county to recover for publishing such list, plaintiff need not allege that there is money in the county treasury to meet the demand, or that the allowance of the demand would not exceed the limit of liability which the county is authorized to contract for the fiscal year.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; E. A. Davis, Judge.

Action by Frank W. Johnson against the county of Yuba, Cal., to recover for services rendered in publishing certain lists of nominations, as required by statute. From orders sustaining a motion to strike parts of the complaint, and sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. H. Carlin, M. E. Sanborn, and Richard Belcher, for appellant. E. P. McDaniel and J. H. Craddock, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The superior court did not err in striking from the complaint the matter objected to as irrelevant and redundant. The action was to recover for services rendered in publishing the list of nominations required to be published by the county clerk, under section 1194 of the Political Code, for the general election in November, 1892, in the county of Yuba. The allegations contained in the matter stricken out proceeded upon the theory that the statute required the publication of a separate list of the nominations, complete in itself, for each of the political subdivisions of the county having offices to fill; each list to contain, besides the names of those nominated for state and county offices, only the names of the district or township nominees in the county to be voted for in a particular district or township, and, in pursuance of this theory, alleged the publication of 13 separate lists,—1 for each of 2 supervisor districts, and 1 for each of 11 judicial townships. The statute will bear no such construction. It provides that: "At least two days before an election to fill any public office, the county clerk of each county shall cause to be published in at least two newspapers of general circulation within the county the nominations to office certified to him by the secretary of state, and also all those filed with the county clerk. He shall make not less than two publications in each of such newspapers before election day, one of such publications being made upon the last day upon which such newspaper is issued before the day of election. The list of such nominations published by the county clerks of the respective counties shall be arranged in the order and form in which they will be printed upon the ballot." Reasonably construed, this language contemplates the publication of one general list of all nominations upon which the people of the county will be called to exercise their choice. The evident purpose of the statute is the education of the voters of the county in their duties as electors, by informing them of the names of those proposed for their suffrages for the various offices to be filled at the ensuing election, and the general order and form in which the names will appear on the ballot to be voted, that the voters may thus be afforded the opportunity to acquaint themselves with the character and fitness of such nominees, and how to mark their tickets, thus enabling them to more readily and intelligently discharge their duty on the day of election. This purpose is as well subserved by the publication of one general list embracing all the nominations as it would be by the mode adopted by appellant's assignor. It is not, as appellant erroneously contends, an exact copy or fac simile of the official ballot that is to be published, but a "list of nominations." Nor is it contemplated, apparently, that the information to be furnished by such publication will be necessarily as exact in all respects as that to be had by the voter from an inspection of the "sample ballot" provided for in section 1210, Pol. Code, to be furnished to voters five days before election, or the official ballot to be voted on election day, but is rather to prepare the mind of the voter in a general way, as above indicated, for a more ready understanding of such official ballot, when he comes to vote. To adopt a construction which would sustain the attitude of appellant would be simply to impose an unreasonable burden of expense upon the taxpayers without any corresponding benefit. The matter, being irrelevant to the cause of action stated, was properly reached on a motion to strike out.

We think, however, that the complaint was not open to the objections raised by the demurrer, and that the latter should have been overruled. The objection that the cost of the publication provided for by the act is not made a county charge is untenable. It is a part of the county advertising, and falls within the provisions of subdivision 23, § 25, of the county government act (St. 1891, p. 305), by which the supervisors are authorized to provide for such advertising. Nor is it any ground of demurrer that it is not alleged that there was money in the county treasury to meet the demand, or that the allowance of the demand against the county would not exceed the limit of liability which the county was authorized to contract for the fiscal year. This was purely matter of defense, if it existed. Johnson v. Sacramento Co., 65 Cal. 481, 4 Pac. 463. We think the other objections urged to the complaint equally untenable. Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer.

PEOPLE v. WELLS. (No. 21,089.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1894.)

PERJURY—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for perjury for testifying on the trial of one D. for the larceny of a cow, that he met the cow going towards D.'s house early in the morning, and that D. took it up, corroborative facts are insufficient without direct testimony of one witness that such meeting did not take place.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

John Wells was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Reversed.

Frank H. Short, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellant has been convicted of the crime of perjury, and now appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Section 1968 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that perjury must be proved by the testimony of two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances. This declaration of the Code clearly means that the falsity of the accused's statements must be shown to the jury by the positive testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness and circumstances corroborating the statement of such witness, in order that the defendant may be legally convicted of the crime of perjury. In other words, the law prescribes a different rule of evidence in this class of cases, both as to the kind and amount, as compared to the great majority of violations of the law. The rule is different as to the kind of evidence, for positive evidence is absolutely necessary, and circumstantial evidence alone is never sufficient. Again, for nearly all violations of the law the evidence of one credible witness is sufficient to support a conviction, but in prosecutions for perjury the rule is clearly to the contrary.

In the present case, one Dillwood was upon trial charged with grand larceny in stealing a cow, the cow being found in Dillwood's barn about 11 o'clock a. m., and having been stolen some miles away upon the previous night. The defendant in this case appeared at the trial as a witness in Dillwood's interest, and testified that, about 8 a. m. of the same morning, he was traveling in his cart upon the public highway near Dillwood's house, and met this cow upon a bridge, the cow then going towards Dillwood's house, and that he then saw Dillwood drive the cow into his barn, and at that time Dillwood stated that the cow was not his cow. It was alleged in the information that this testimony was false, and the charge of perjury is based thereon. We will not enter into a discussion as to the materiality of this evidence as bearing upon the grand larceny charge, but will concede it to be material. It is then left for us to consider the sufficiency of the evidence introduced at this trial to support the verdict.

As we have already suggested, in order that the evidence may be sufficient, there must be positive testimony to a contrary state of facts from that sworn to by the defendant at the previous trial. For instance, to support the charge of perjury as to the alleged false statement of defendant that he met the cow at the time stated upon this particular public highway, it was necessary to produce the positive testimony of one witness at least that such meeting did not take place, as that the defendant was not at that time at that place, or that the cow was not there; and the same rule is equally applicable to the remaining portions of the alleged false testimony. The corroborating circumstances disclosed by the record are sufficiently established, but the one witness to furnish the positive testimony of the commission of the perjury was not produced at the trial. The record discloses no witness who testifies that the aforesaid meeting between the defendant and the cow did not take place. The falsity of defendant's statements as to the alleged meeting may well be termed the "corpus delicti," and in cases like the present the corpus delicti must be proven by the positive evidence of at least one witness. The defendant's testimony given in the grand larceny case, and as set out in the information, is only proven to be false by incidents and circumstances occurring at other times and places; and, while such evidence in a case of the present character is proper as furnishing the corroborating circumstances required by the section of the Code we have quoted, it in no sense takes the place of the positive and direct evidence of one witness as to the corpus deliciti demanded by the statute. As supporting the general principle that the direct testimony of one witness is necessary to prove the charge of perjury, see 1 Greenl. Ev. § 257, and 3 Russ. Crimes, marg. p. 78. In the case of U. S. v. Wood, 14 Pet. 430, it is held that a person may be convicted of perjury upon certain kinds and classes of documentary evidence, and thus the offense be proven without the testimony of a living witness; but it is said in that case: "It must be conceded no case has yet occurred in our own or the English courts where a conviction for perjury had been had without a witness speaking to the corpus delicti of the defendant, except in a case of contradictory oaths by the same person." As to whether or not a confession of the defendant would be sufficient evidence to stand in lieu of the testimony of the one witness we are not called upon to decide, as the evidence found in the record pertaining to an alleged confession is wholly insufficient to prove it. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

TEMPLE ST. CABLE RY. CO. v. HELLMAN et al. (No. 19,136.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1894.)

SET-OFF—CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS—BURDEN OF PROOF—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

1. Where a railroad company, as an inducement to establish a baseball park, to increase its traffic, executes its note, and exacts in return a contract secured by a bond providing for the payment of the note on failure to perform the contract, the principal and sureties, when sued on the bond, are entitled to set off against the amount of the note, with interest, any money paid pursuant to the contract.

2. The giving of a note by a street railway for the purpose of increasing its legtimate business is not ultra vires.

3. After defendant has by its contract admitted the execution of a note by plaintiff in pursuance of the contract, the burden of proof to show want of authority in executing it is on the defendant.

4. Where a contract made in consideration of a note stipulates that action may be taken immediately after its breach, a prior payment of the note is not necessary to recovery on the contract.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action on a bond by the Temple Street Cable-Railway Company against Marco Hellman and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Reversed.

Graff & Latham, for appellants. Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. On May 5, 1890, the plaintiff was a corporation owning and engaged in operating a street railway at Los Angeles, and the defendant Marco Hellman was conducting a baseball park on First street, in that city. For the purpose of increasing the traffic on its road, the plaintiff, at the date mentioned, executed to Hellman its negotiable promissory note for $5,500, payable in two years, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, which he transferred to a third party, who, at the commencement of this action, was the owner and holder thereof. In consideration of the receipt of this note, Hellman on his part agreed, among other things, to discontinue the playing of baseball at the First street grounds, and within 60 days to establish, and for two years thereafter to maintain, a first-class baseball park on a tract of land adjacent to plaintiff's line, of which he had become the lessee. He further agreed to give at the new grounds not less than 104 games of baseball or other equivalent entertainment each year, to provide suitable accommodations for the public, and to pay over to the plaintiff monthly 10 per cent. of the gross receipts for admissions. The other defendants, in order to induce the plaintiff to enter into this contract and to execute its said promissory note to Hellman, became his sureties on a bond in the penal sum of $7,000, conditioned for the faithful performance by him of the principal contract, or, in case of the violation of any of its stipulations, to save the plaintiff harmless on account of its promissory note. Hellman having failed to complete his preparations to open the new grounds within 60 days, he and his sureties, on July 5th, obtained an extension of time until August 1st, and on the 2d of August they obtained a further extension of time until October 1st. Both of these extension agreements were in writing, and contained various stipulations in regard to continuing the games at the First street grounds, division of the gate receipts, indemnity to plaintiff for loss of fares, and other matters not requiring special notice. In addition to these things, Hellman and his sureties, at the time of obtaining the second extension, executed a new contract of indemnity to the plaintiff, which, after referring to and reciting the more material portions of the various contracts, etc., above mentioned, contains, among others, the following stipulation: "That in case said Marco Hellman fails to perform any of the agreements mentioned in the said contract of May 5, 1890, as modified by the agreement of extension of July 5, 1890, and this agreement, or fails to perform any of the covenants on his part contained in the agreement of July 5, 1890, or this agreement, at the time in said contract or in said agreements mentioned, they will pay the amount of the note mentioned in the said contract and the interest therein provided, and said company shall have the right to immediately begin suit against said Marco Hellman and the sureties on said bond to recover the amount of the said note and the interest therein provided. This provision shall not be construed a waiver of any other right of action which the said company may have for breach of said contract of agreement." Hellman never complied with his agreements, but, after giving only about a dozen entertainments, abandoned the enterprise, and forfeited his lease. Thereupon, on September 2, 1891, and before the plaintiff's note had been paid or was due, this action was commenced against Hellman and his sureties. Plaintiff recovered a judgment for $6,737.50, from which, as well as from an order overruling their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

Much of the argument on the part of appellants is devoted to a discussion of the nature of the action,—a point which does not seem to us to present any serious difficulty. Assuming that the plaintiff had the power to enter into this particular contract, and that its note was duly executed, it had two remedies for a breach of the principal contract by Marco Hellman,—it could either sue him for the profit it would have made by performance of his agreement, or it could sue him and his sureties on the second contract of indemnity for the amount of its promissory note for $5,500 and interest. Having this choice of remedies, the plaintiff elected to pursue the latter, and its complaint is entirely sufficient to entitle it to the relief sought. All the facts above detailed are fully set out, along with other formal allegations showing the right of the plaintiff to recover from Hellman and his sureties the amount of plaintiff's note, the proceeds of which he had received and which it had bound itself to pay. But the appellants contend that to allow the plaintiff to recover the full amount of its note and interest, after a partial performance by Hellman of his contract, and receipt by plaintiff of some of the profit and advantage of performance on his part, is unjust and unfair, and is the enforcement of a penalty or an award of liquidated damages in a case where a stipulation for liquidated damages is unlawful. They say that, upon the same theory that allows a recovery of the full amount of the note and interest after a few games had been played at the new grounds, and receipt by plaintiff of the increased fares on its road caused by the giving of such games, the like amount must have been recovered if all but the last one of the 208 games had been given, and the plaintiff had actually received a large profit from the giving of such games. In the view we entertain of the rights of the parties under the contract, this argument has no force. Whatever the plaintiff received as the result of Hellman's partial performance he and his sureties have a right to set off against the amount of the note and interest. The plaintiff, not being able or willing to prove the profits it would have made by performance on the part of Hellman, elects to resort to the bond of indemnity on account of its note. It is clearly entitled to that indemnity in full, but it is entitled to nothing more. If it has received anything from Hellman, much or little, defendants are entitled to a corresponding deduction from the full amount of the liability assumed. But it is for them to allege and prove the amount so received. If this view is correct,—and we are satisfied it is,—the case is relieved of all the difficulty suggested in the argument of counsel.

It follows, however, from this view, that the judgment of the superior court is for too large a sum. The utmost amount which the plaintiff could in any case have recovered in this form of action is $6,600; i. e. $5,500 principal, and two years' interest thereon, at 10 per cent., amounting to $1,100. The superior court seems to have added to these sums $137.50, or a quarter's interest, which is found to have been paid by the plaintiff on the note. But this quarter's interest is a part of the $1,100, and cannot be added to it. It also appears that plaintiff received from Hellman, at different times, sums amounting to $207.50, which should be deducted from the full amount of the $6,600. The amount of any increased fares that may have been received by plaintiff in consequence of the playing of a few games at the new grounds does not appear. This disposes of the principal questions discussed in the argument, but there remain to be noticed a few minor objections.

The giving of its note by plaintiff was not ultra vires. The object was to increase its legitimate business, and the case, as to this point, is within the principle of the decisions in Vandall v. Dock Co., 40 Cal. 83, and Zienwaldt v. Railroad Co., 1 Pac. Coast Law J. 123. The admissions of the defendants in the contracts executed by them were sufficient evidence prima facie to warrant the superior court in finding that the note of the plaintiff was duly executed, and renders harmless the error, if error it was, in overruling defendants' objection to the testimony of the witness Wood. After their repeated admissions of the execution of the note, the burden was on the defendants to show want of authority on the part of the officers of the corporation to execute it. It is no objection to the right of plaintiff to recover that it had not paid its note before this action was commenced. The defendants expressly agreed that the action might be immediately commenced upon the failure of Hellman to perform any of his agreements, irrespective of the payment or maturity of the note.

In accordance with the foregoing views, it is necessary to reverse the judgment, for the error of the superior court in awarding too large an amount, but it does not seem to be necessary to order a new trial. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to modify its judgment as follows: The plaintiff should have judgment for $6,600, less $207.50, —i. e. for $6,392.50,—with legal interest thereon from May 5, 1892, the date of the maturity of plaintiff's note, and costs in the superior court.

PACIFIC COAST RY. CO. v. RAMAGE, Tax Collector. (No. 19,343.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—TAXATION—DOUBLE TAXATION.

When a railroad company, empowered by charter to build its road between termini in different counties, lays its tracks at one terminus on a wharf, and the whole railroad is assessed by the state board of equalization, pursuant to Const. art. 13, § 10, providing that the roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of all railroads operated in more than one county shall be assessed by that board, an assessment of the wharf by the county tax collector does not constitute double taxation, since the wharf is not a necessary part of the railroad, and brings in a separate income.

Action by the Pacific Coast Railway Company against George W. Ramage, tax collector, to set aside an assessment. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wilcoxon & Bouldin and J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellant. F. A. Dorn, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from the judgment and upon the judgment roll. The complaint shows that plaintiff, a corporation, is engaged in operating a steam railway between Los Olivos, in Santa Barbara county, and Port Harford, in San Luis Obispo county. The defendant is the tax collector of San Luis Obispo county. During the fiscal year of 1892–93, plaintiff was, and still is, the owner of a railway in San Luis Obispo county, 39.5 miles, and no more, of which 9 miles, and no more, were in Santa Fe school district, in said county, which said 9 miles the state board of equalization assessed for that year at $46,123.47, and no more, which taxes were paid by plaintiff. That the county assessor, in addition, arbitrarily and without authority, assessed a portion of the railroad so assessed by said state board of equalization at the sum of $6,000, upon which a tax is levied of $79.25, which is claimed to constitute a lien upon said property. There is a proper averment as to the threat of the tax collector to sell the property for the tax, and that the invalidity of the tax does not appear from the face of the assessment, and a prayer for an injunction. The answer consists of denials. The findings are as follows: "This cause came on regularly for trial before the court on the 24th day of July, 1893, upon the complaint of plaintiff and the answer of defendant, both parties being represented by counsel. Evidence was introduced by both parties, and the cause submitted for decision, and the court now finds the facts of said case to be as follows: That in the year 1874, by an act of the legislature of the state of California, entitled 'An act to provide for the construction of a railroad from the Bay of San Luis Obispo, in the county of San Luis Obispo, to Santa Maria, in the county of Santa Barbara,' approved March 27, 1874 (St. 1873–74, p. 695), John M. Price, Juan V. Avila, N. Goldtree, H. M. Newhall, John O'Farrell, F. S. Wensinger, Charles Goodall, and Christopher Nelson, or their successors or assigns, were chartered and did construct a railroad extending from the town of Santa Maria to the Bay of San Luis Obispo, and extended to what was then known as the 'People's Wharf,' on said bay. That prior to the year 1874 one John Harford constructed a wharf on said bay, at a point about one mile northwest of said wharf, known as the 'People's Wharf.' That plaintiff is now, and at all the times set forth in the complaint herein was, a corporation formed and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, for the purpose of, and was and is engaged in, operating a steam railway between Los Olivos in Santa Barbara county, and Port Harford, in San Luis Obispo county. That on the —— day of ——, 1874, this plaintiff succeeded to the interest of said John Harford in and to said wharf built by him, and also to the interest of John M. Price, Juan V. Avila, N. Goldtree, H. M. Newhall, John O'Farrell, F. S. Wensinger, Charles Goodall, and Christopher Nelson, and their successors and assigns, in and to said railroad, and then extended said railroad about one mile to the Harford wharf, and from time to time, prior to the year 1890, extended said Harford wharf into the Bay of San Luis Obispo, beyond low-water mark; and ever since the year 1890 the said wharf has been of the following dimensions, to wit: Commencing at the hotel, a point below low-water mark, the wharf is 16 feet wide for 452 feet, at which point it commences at 22 feet, and runs to 78 feet broad for 416 feet. It then tapers from 78 feet to 56 feet for 256 feet, and is 56 feet broad for 144 feet, at the end of which distance it broadens from 56 feet to 108 feet for 288 feet, and from which distance it is 108 feet broad to its far end, 320 feet, making a total length of 1,876 feet. That said plaintiff, prior to the year 1890, built upon and there has ever since been on the outer end of said wharf belonging to plaintiff a building as follows: A large one-story building, 60 feet broad by 228 feet long, within which is located the depot of said company, railroad office, telegraph office, station house, and waiting rooms, in a room 18x 22 feet in size. That plaintiff maintains upon said wharf its line of track, and two double switches extended to the extreme end of said wharf, for the purpose of receiving and discharging freight and passengers carried by water, and said track and switches are a portion of its main line of track. Said double switches are located on both sides of said building. That defendant is now the duly elected, qualified, and acting tax collector of San Luis Obispo county. That, for the fiscal year 1892-93, plaintiff was, and is now, the owner of a line of railway as above set forth, which measured a distance, counting from the water end of said wharf or structure to where the same crosses the line between San Luis Obispo and Santa Barbara counties, of 39.5 miles, all of which was in the first-named county, which was duly assessed for taxation by the state board of equalization, and apportioned by said board to San Luis Obispo county during said fiscal year. That thereafter, and during the time for assessment of property by county assessors, the assessor of San Luis Obispo county regularly assessed and added to the assessment of plaintiff for said year the following items: Franchise granted by the board of supervisors, $500; furniture, $250; safe and scales, $500; machinery and tools, $1,500; 3 wagons, $75; 1 A. horse, $75; 273,000 feet of lumber, $5,460; 100 cords of wood, $400; other personal property, not described, $500; wharf and warehouse at Port Harford, $6,000. That all taxes assessed as aforesaid for said fiscal year upon all of said assessments have been paid by plaintiff, except a tax of $75, levied upon 'wharf and warehouse at Port Harford, valued at $6,000,' which with costs, percentages, etc., now amounts to the sum of $79.25, which is claimed to constitute a lien on the property of plaintiff. That plaintiff owns no wharf or warehouse at Port Harford other than the one hereinbefore described, and did not own any such during said fiscal year. That said sum of $79.25 has not been paid by plaintiff because it claimed that the same was illegal and a double assessment. That defendant, as tax collector, as aforesaid, has advertised the said property last above mentioned for sale, to satisfy said last-named sum, and threatens to sell the same therefor. That, under and by virtue of the following clause in a license ordinance of the board of supervisors of said San Luis Obispo county, plaintiff pays a license tax to said county of $25 per quarter, and did so during the whole of said fiscal year. The clause is as follows: 'Every person, association, or corporation engaged in the business of conducting or carrying on a bridge, ferry, wharf, chute, or pier, for the accommodation of the public or others, for hire, whose average yearly receipts therefrom exceed $10,000, shall pay a license tax in the sum of $25 per quarter.' That plaintiff during said fiscal year did conduct a wharf as hereinbefore described, for hire, and its receipts therefrom for wharfage exceeded $10,000." Conclusions of law: "In my opinion, said wharf and building thereon was legally assessed by the county assessor, not being the class of property assessable by the state board of equalization, under section 10, art. 13, Const. Cal. See Santa Clara Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 118 U. S. 394, 6 Sup. Ct. 1132. The plaintiff claims that the property is assessed double, because the number of miles of road assessed by state board in the county will, as measured on the ground, include distance enough to extend the road assessment to end of wharf. I assume, as a conclusion of law, that the mileage assessed by state board was based upon data returned by plaintiff to that board for assessment. Let judgment enter for defendant for his costs. Plaintiff will take nothing by this action."

The contention of the appellant is that the assessment of the wharf by the county assessor is double taxation; that the same was properly assessed by the state board; that the length of the wharf is included in the mileage of railroad assessed by the state board; and that, the railway having been built upon the wharf, it constitutes the "roadbed," which the state board was to assess. Const. art. 13, § 10. It is also contended that, inasmuch as the assessment includes the roadbed, the assessment is void, although it were conceded that the wharf and warehouse are something more than a mere roadbed or roadway, because the unlawful part cannot be separated from that which is lawful. California v. Central Pac. R. Co., 127 U. S. 1, 8 Sup. Ct. 1073. The invalidity of the assessment, if any, does not appear upon the face thereof. The presumption is that it is valid. Has the plaintiff shown its invalidity? I think not. The wharf is a structure in navigable waters of the state. It could not be lawfully constructed without the grant of authority in some form from the state. The incorporation of the plaintiff did not necessarily confer upon plaintiff that right. The points between which they are authorized to construct and operate a railway are not shown further than that they are operating such a road between Port Harford and Los Olivos. Port Harford is somewhat indefinite. The wharf was constructed by a private individual, presumably under lawful authority, and apparently the wharf was purchased by plaintiff after the construction of the railway built by plaintiff's predecessors. Under such circumstances, the fact that plaintiff has since extended its track over the wharf does not necessarily imply that it rightfully did so as a part of the railway that it was authorized by its charter to build and operate. The wharf, in its nature, is not necessarily a part of a railway. This wharf pays a large income as a wharf. Had it remained the property of Harford, and the railroad been constructed upon it, the presumption would have been that the track was for the convenient use of the wharf, as well as of the railway, and it would not have constituted a part of the railway for purposes of taxation. I do not think the findings show that it does now. In the case of City of San Francisco v. Central Pac. R. Co., 63 Cal. 467, it appeared that the ferry was a part of the line of the railroad as described in its articles, and it was claimed that the ferryboat upon which the tracks were laid constituted a portion of its roadbed, but it was held otherwise. Here it is not made to appear that the wharf constitutes any part of the line of the road. The fact that the mileage assessed by the state board would include the length of the wharf is immaterial. That was undoubtedly as it was given in by plaintiff. But whatever length they gave in it could not extend beyond the two termini which are required to be fixed in their articles. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GORDON. (No. 21,077.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1894.)

Criminal Law—Reception of Evidence—Cross-Examination—Remarks of Counsel—Assault with Intent to Kill.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1094, providing that the court may in its discretion depart from the prescribed order of evidence, its action in excluding evidence because it was not introduced in its regular order will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. On a trial for shooting, where defendant testified as to his habit of carrying a revolver, it was proper on cross-examination to ask him if he could identify as his own a revolver shown him, under Pen. Code, § 1323, providing that a defendant may be cross-examined as to all matters about which he was examined in chief.

3. A witness for the prosecution, in answer to a question on cross-examination as to whether, after the shooting, defendant did not walk up the street leisurely, replied, "No, sir; he walked as though he was a little anxious." Held, that a motion to strike out the answer as not responsive was properly denied.

4. A conviction will not be reversed because the prosecuting officer asked an improper question, when an objection to the same was sustained, and the jury was instructed to give it no heed.

5. Evidence as to the character of defendant must be confined to his general reputation.

6. In an action for assault with intent to kill, it was proper to refuse to charge that, if defendant was in such condition of mind from intoxication as to be incapable of forming an intent to commit the offense, the jury must acquit; as the offense includes the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, and intent is not an element of that crime.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Elmer E. Gordon was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and appeals. Affirmed.

Daney & Wright, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. The appellant was tried in the superior court in and for the county of San Diego for the crime of assault with a deadly weapon upon L. D. Hauser, with the intent to commit murder, and was convicted of the crime of an assault with a deadly weapon, and was by the judgment of the court sentenced to imprisonment for the term of one year in the state prison at San Quentin. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

At the trial, after the prosecution and defense had introduced their testimony, and while the prosecution was introducing testimony in rebuttal, counsel for the defendant asked leave to recall, for further cross-examination, L. D. Hauser, the prosecuting witness, for the purpose of laying a foundation for impeaching said witness by showing that he had declared soon after the shooting that defendant did not fire the pistol to hit him, etc. Counsel claimed that he only received information of the existence of the declaration on the morning of the day the offer was made. The court denied the request, and the action is assigned as error. The Penal Code (section 1093) provides that, after the prosecution and defense have respectively offered their testimony, "the parties may then respectively offer rebutting testimony only, unless the court, for good reason, in furtherance of justice, permit them to offer evidence upon their original case." Section 1094 provides that in any case, for good reasons, the court may, in its sound discretion, depart from the order prescribed in the preceding section. The matter being confided to the discretion of the court, an appellate court cannot review the action of the trial judge, except where it is apparent there has been an abuse of such discretion. Wright v. Willcox, 9 C. B. 650; People v. Cook, 8 N. Y. 67; Williams v. Sargeant, 46 N. Y. 482. Our own decisions are full upon the point to like effect. There is no abuse of discretion shown. The reason given by the court was sufficient to authorize the refusal; and, if no reason had been given, this court could not reverse the ruling in such a case without an affirmative showing of an abuse of discretion. It follows that the error is not well assigned.

There was no error in the ruling of the court in permitting the prosecution to ask the defendant, who was a witness in his own behalf, on cross-examination, to identify a revolver shown him, "and to tell the jury whether or not it was his revolver." Upon his direct examination he had stated that the reason he had a revolver on the day of the difficulty was that he had purchased it a few weeks earlier, and carried it nights when he went home with his money from his fruit stand, and laid it on a shelf in the morning when he came back, but that morning (the day of the difficulty) had forgotten to leave it, etc.[1] Having thus testified as to a revolver, it was proper to ask him to identify it. People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466, 35 Pac. 80.

Defendant's counsel asked a witness on cross-examination the following question, in reference to the manner in which defendant walked up the street after the shooting: "He walked up the street very leisurely, did he not?"—to which the witness answered: "No, sir; he walked as though he was a little anxious." Defendant moved to strike out the answer as not responsive, which was refused, and an exception noted. The first part of the answer was responsive to the question, and the remainder, if indefinite, might easily have been explained by a question as to the meaning of the term used by the witness. The real point of the inquiry related to the condition of the defendant as to sobriety or drunkenness at the time, and it may well have been that the witness used the expression as indicating the presence of reasoning faculties. In any event, it was of little importance.

When counsel for the defendant objected to a question asked of a witness for the prosecution in rebuttal, as to the witness having passed the place of business of Cherry within the last year or two, the court stated, "I do not see any materiality in it anyway," and sustained the objection. I agree with the court in saying that there was no materiality in the proposed testimony, and the court had an undoubted right in giving the reason for his ruling. Had the question been confined to the time when Cherry had testified to his passing his place, it might possibly have been relevant, though of little importance.

E. J. Louis, a witness for defendant, had testified in chief that he had known the defendant for about three years, and knew his general reputation for peace and quietness in that community during that time, and that it was good. Upon cross-examination the district attorney asked this question: "Don't you know as a fact that his wife procured a divorce from him on account of cruelty and inhuman treatment within the last two years?" An objection was sustained to the question, and the jury instructed to give no heed to the question. The point is still made that the conduct of the district attorney was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, tended to prejudice the jury against him, and that the judgment for that cause should be reversed. The case of People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 Pac. 1078, probably goes as far in the direction pointed out by appellant as any well-considered case extant. That was an aggravated case, in which the court evidently believed the public prosecutor had wantonly and repeatedly transcended the limits of a fair investigation with the object of prejudicing the rights of the defendant, and poisoning the minds of the jurors, and this court reversed the judgment. The case here is very different. No evidence of a desire or design to do injustice to the defendant is apparent. At most, all that can be said is that the district attorney asked an improper question, which was objected to, the objection sustained, and the jury instructed to disregard it. The fact that the question was improper seems to be tacitly conceded. The rule is as follows: If evidence of good character is given in behalf of the prisoner, evidence of bad character may be given in reply; but in either case the evidence must be confined to the prisoner's general reputation, and the individual opinion of the witness as to his disposition, founded on his own experience and observation, is inadmissible. There is no doubt that, when a witness is put upon the stand to attack or defend character, he can only be asked on the examination in chief as to the general character of the person whose character is the subject of the inquiry, and he will not be permitted to testify to particular facts either favorable or unfavorable to such person. To this extent, it is believed, there is no divergence of opinion among authors or jurists. But there are many respectable authorities to the effect that, when the witness who has thus testified is subject to cross-examination, he may then be asked, with a view to test the value of his testimony, as to particular facts. Having testified as to the defendant's general good character, his opinion and the value of it may be tested by asking the witness on cross-examination whether he has ever heard that the person in question has been accused of doing acts wholly inconsistent with the character which he has attributed to him. 3 Rice, Cr. Ev. pp. 604, 605; State v. Merriman, 34 S. C. 16, 12 S. E. 619; Jackson v. State, 78 Ala. 471; Steele v. State, 83 Ala. 20, 3 South. 547; 1 Tayl. Ev. § 352; Oliver v. Pate, 43 Ind. 132; State v. Arnold, 12 Iowa, 480; Leonard v. Allen, 11 Cush. 241; Carpenter v. Blake, 10 Hun, 358. In such cases it is not the truth of the particular facts, but circulating rumors of them, which form a part of the general repute, and go to make up one's good or bad character. The doctrine is illustrated by the case of Reg. v. Wood, 5 Jur. 225, where a witness for a defendant charged with highway robbery, having testified to the good character of the prisoner, was asked on cross-examination whether he had not heard that the prisoner was suspected of having committed a robbery in the vicinity a few years before. It was objected that this was a particular fact, raising a collateral issue. Baron Parke overruled the objection, and remarked: "The question is not whether the prisoner was guilty of that robbery, but whether he was suspected of having been implicated in it. A man's character is made up of a number of small circumstances, of which his being suspected of misconduct is one." If, therefore, we concede the district attorney was wrong in putting the question, he was in such good company and backed by such an array of authority that no inference of intended oppression or injustice to the defendant can be presumed; and to suppose that the jury were unduly influenced thereby is to place a very low estimate upon their intelligence and capacity.

[1] Pen. Code, § 1323, provides that a defendant in a criminal action cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself; but, if he offers himself as a witness, he may be cross-examined as to all matters as to which he was examined in chief.

The court instructed the jury on its own motion, and at the request of counsel for the defendant gave nineteen out of twenty-three instructions presented by him. Those given presented the case in as favorable an aspect on behalf of defendant as the law would warrant. Three of the four refused related to the intoxication of the defendant at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, and sought to establish the proposition that if defendant was in such a condition of mind, from intoxication, at the time of the alleged commission of the offense as to be incapable of forming an intent to commit the offense, or that he committed the act without being conscious thereof, or that the jury entertained a reasonable doubt as to his condition in those respects, they should acquit. In lieu thereof, the court instructed the jury in the language of section 22 of the Penal Code, and then instructed them that in the charge of an assault to commit murder the specific intent to take life is a necessary element of the crime, and that, in considering the question whether the defendant is guilty or not of this offense, they should take into consideration the question of his intoxication, etc., but that the charge also involved the charge of an assault with a deadly weapon, and that in this last charge no specific intent is necessary to constitute the crime, and hence as to that charge the question of intoxication was improper to be considered. This distinction was proper. People v. Franklin, 70 Cal. 641, 11 Pac. 797; People v. Marseiler, 70 Cal. 98, 11 Pac. 503. The other instruction refused was in the following language: "In considering the testimony of the witness Hauser, as well as the testimony of every other witness, you have a right and it is your duty to consider the circumstances under which he testified, and the manner in which he gives his testimony; and if you should believe from the testimony that the letter introduced by the defendant was either written or delivered by the witness Hauser, or that it was written or delivered at his suggestion, or with his knowledge and consent, then you have a right and it is your duty to consider that fact in weighing the testimony of such witness." The instruction was objectionable, for the reason that it sought to single out the witness Hauser, and call the especial attention of the jury to him and his testimony, on account of an anonymous letter received by the witness Cherry, who is a brother-in-law of the defendant, which letter suggested that Hauser could be sent away if it was managed right, etc. There was no evidence whatever that Hauser was the author of or connected in any way with the letter, except that he had passed the place of business of Cherry two or three times on the day preceding the morning when the letter was found, under the door of Cherry. Hauser denied all knowledge of the letter, and several circumstances tended to corroborate his statement. The witness Cherry admitted that he had previously and the night after the trouble visited Hauser, and sought "to know if there was any way of getting it fixed up, if he could not withdraw the case, and he said he could not." He also testified that "Hauser never made any remark to me that would indicate that he wanted me to give him money in consideration of his not appearing in this case." The fact is very apparent that, on account of the mother and sister of the defendant, the friends of the latter were anxious to stifle a prosecution, and that the witness Hauser informed them the matter was in the hands of the law, and he had nothing to do with its adjustment. Defendant was fairly tried and convicted, upon testimony amply sufficient to uphold the verdict, and the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

DUNCAN v. HAWN et al. (No. 18,176.)

THRESHER'S LIEN—ASSIGNMENT OF DEBT—EFFECT.

Where a lien has been acquired under St. 1885, p. 109, by person performing work in or about a threshing machine while engaged in threshing, the same passes by the assignment of the debt under which it was acquired.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by George O. Duncan against C. H. Hawn and others to foreclose a lien on a threshing machine. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Church, for appellants. W. D. Grady and James Gallagher, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. An act of the legislature entitled "An act to secure the wages of persons employed as laborers on threshing machines" (St. 1885, p. 109) provides:

"Section 1. Every person performing work or labor of any kind in, with, about or upon any threshing machine, the engine, horsepower, wagons or appurtenances thereof, while engaged in threshing, shall have a lien upon the same to the extent of the value of his services.

"Sec. 2. The lien herein given shall extend for ten days after the person has ceased such work or labor.

"Sec. 3. If judgment shall be recovered in any action to recover for said services for work or labor performed, and said property shall be sold, the proceeds of such sale shall be distributed pro rata to all judgment creditors, who have within ten days begun suits to recover judgments for the amount due them for such work.

"Sec. 4. The lien shall expire unless a suit to recover the amount of the claim is brought within ten days after the party ceases work."

Plaintiff, as assignee of the claims of certain laborers who had performed work of the character provided for in the act with the threshing machine of the defendants, brought this action with the 10-days limitation to enforce and foreclose a lien for the value of said labor. The court below gave judgment sustaining plaintiff's right to the lien, and directing a sale of the property for its satisfaction. The defendants appeal.

The material question involved in the appeal is whether the lien given by the statute passes by the assignment of the obligation it is given to secure, it being conceded that the assignments were sufficient in form to convey any rights which could pass under the law. There is a conflict in authority from other states as to whether statutory liens of the class created by the act in question pass by assignment of the debt; some of the authorities holding that it is strictly a personal right, and dies unless asserted in the hands of the one for whose benefit it is primarily given; while other cases hold in effect that, being given as security for the performance of the obligation, it becomes an incident which follows it upon assignment. Whatever may be the rule in other states, in the absence of statutory regulation it would seem that the Code solves the question here presented. Section 2909 of the Civil Code, speaking on the subject of liens in general, declares that "a lien is to be deemed accessory to the act for the performance of which it is security;" and section 1084 of the same Code, relating to the effect of transfer, provides that "the transfer of a thing transfers also all its incidents, unless expressly excepted." The language of section 2909 may be taken as referring to perfected and subsisting liens. It is to be observed that the statute under consideration does not give a mere right to establish a lien, but by its terms ipso facto on the cessation of work there results by operation of the statute a perfected and established lien, which subsists for a period of 10 days, without the filing of notice or other affirmative act by the laborer. Under the rule above declared, this lien becomes an incident of the primary obligation,—the debt due the laborer,—the right to which must be held to pass by assignment of the latter, unless there is something in the act creating it which takes it out of this general rule prescribed by the Code. We find no such limitation in the act. It neither in terms nor by implication tends to restrict the right to enforce the lien to the laborer. Its primary purpose is the benefit and protection of the laborer in securing his hire, and it is obvious that this purpose would be largely destroyed by any such restriction. As suggested by the supreme court of Maine in speaking of a similar lien: "The object of the statute giving the lien is to make certain the payment for the labor; * * * and it would detract much from the benefit designed to be conferred to hold that the laborer must necessarily personally incur all the delay and expense that not unfrequently arise from the tedious litigation which follows an effort to enforce a lien of this sort, at the peril of losing it altogether." Murphy v. Adams, 71 Me. 118. In that case, as here, the court were passing upon the question of the assignability of a lien of this character, and it is there further said: "The claims of laborers secured by statute lien stand substantially in this respect upon the same footing as those of mechanics. The weight of authority and reasoning is in favor of the assignability of the lien of a mechanic, and the right of his assignee to assert his claim in the same manner and to the same extent as the mechanic could." Indeed, independently of the provisions of our Code, we should be strongly inclined to the conclusion above expressed. The conflict upon the subject has doubtless largely arisen from a failure to distinguish between common-law liens, to the existence of which possession, actual or constructive, is necessary, and those liens of purely statutory origin which had no existence at common law. In the case of Rogers v. Hotel Co., 4 Neb. 57, the court, in discussing a lien given by the statute, point out this distinction, saying: "Liens of this kind are clearly defined and regulated in the civil law, but were unknown to the common law. The proceeding is entirely statutory. * * * At common law, the assignment of a chose in action was entirely prohibited. * * * Section 30 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the assignee of a thing in action may maintain an action thereon in his own behalf, or the name of the assignor. * * * An action of this kind can be maintained by the assignee, unless the lien is strictly personal, so that it is lost the moment it is transferred. * * * Its continuance in no sense depends on retaining possession of the property. It is as complete and ample security for the payment of the debt as a mortgage of the same interest. It depends on no contingency for its continuance during the time prescribed by the statute." In Kerr v. Moore, 54 Miss. 288, speaking of a laborer's lien under the agricultural lien law, the court said: "The lien given by law to the laborer for his wages has been properly likened to that of a mechanic or material man for what is due him. * * * The decided weight of authority and reasoning, according to our view, is in favor of the assignability of the lien of a mechanic, and the right of his assignee to assert his claim and enforce the lien in the same manner and to the same extent that the mechanic could. This view was sustained by the following authorities: Iaege v. Bossieux, 15 Grat. 83; Tuttle v. Howe, 14 Minn. 150 (Gil. 113); Skyrme v. Mining Co., 8 Nev. 219; Davis v. Bilsland, 18 Wall. 659; Ritter v. Stevenson, 7 Cal. 388; Phil. Mech. Liens, § 55. * * * This view better accords with the general policy of our law, and the spirit and purpose of the act which gives the laborer a lien, than the contrary view." Liens which are not merely declaratory of the common law do not require possession to support them. They have the same operation without possession, and the same efficacy as common-law liens have with possession, and the assignment of the claim carries with it the right to the lien. If the existence of the lien does not depend upon possession, it may be assigned. 1 Jones, Liens, §§ 104, 990. The cases relied upon by appellants do not support their contention. In Mills v. Land Co., 97 Cal. 254, 32 Pac. 169, the court simply hold that the mere right of a laborer or material man to create a lien under the mechanics' lien law is a personal right, which cannot be assigned. This is obviously correct, since, until perfected by filing proper notice, it is a mere inchoate right, personal to the individual, which he may choose to perfect or not at his pleasure, and which until perfected has no tangible existence as property, and, of course, as such, is not the subject of transfer. In Rollin v. Cross, 45 N. Y. 771, the plaintiff filed a lien for the amount of all the work done and materials furnished, both by Pick, the original contractor, before assignment, and by himself, as assignee of the contract, and the court held that the statute did not authorize a lien to be perfected by other than the one to whom the right is given by the statute. The Iowa cases are to the same effect. But the assignability of the liens of mechanics and material men, given under our statute, when duly perfected, has been sustained in this state since an early date. In Brock v. Bruce, 5 Cal. 280, it was held that the mechanic's lien law created a sort of mortgage or security, which follows the original debt or obligation; and in Ritter v. Stevenson, 7 Cal. 388, the rule applicable to the assignment of mortgage liens by assignment of the note or debt was applied to assignments of mechanics' liens. The lien under consideration, being a perfected security, is within the reason of the rule laid down in these cases. The respondent having received the assignment of the demands, and commenced his action during the life of the liens, the latter passed by the assignment, and he is entitled to enforce them. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HAMILTON. (No. 21,060.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1894.)

County Clerk — Accounting to Successor in Office—Advance Costs — Criminal Appeal—Res Judicata.

1. The clerk of San Diego county being ex officio clerk of the district court, had power, in actions in such court, to collect advance costs under St. 1875–76, p. 586, providing that the clerk of the district court might demand and receive from the parties to an action certain sums to cover costs.

2. Where a county clerk, acting in his official capacity, and under color of his office as clerk of the superior court, collects advance costs contrary to law, he must, at the end of his term, turn over to the county treasurer, and not to his own successor in office, the amount thereof remaining in his hands.

3. A decision on an appeal which involves only the sufficiency of the information, and the jurisdiction of the court, is not res judicata on an appeal presenting the question whether the offense charged is within the statute under which the indictment was found.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

M. D. Hamilton was convicted of refusing to turn over to his successor, as county clerk, a sum of money collected in his official capacity, and appeals. Reversed.

Eugene Daney, J. L. Copeland, and E. W. Hendrick, for appellant. M. L. Ward, for the People.

SEARLS, C. The defendant, M. D. Hamilton, was county clerk of the county of San Diego for two years next prior to January 5, 1891, when his term of office expired and he was succeeded in said office by one W. M. Gassaway. He was informed against by the district attorney, under section 424 of the Penal Code, for the crime of omitting and refusing to pay over to his successor, the said Gassaway, county clerk, upon demand, the sum of $4,422.36, public money alleged to have been received by him in his official capacity as county clerk, etc. Defendant entered a plea of not guilty to the information, and upon a trial was convicted, and sentenced to two years' confinement in the state prison at San Quentin. At the proper time he moved for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial.

Section 424 of the Penal Code, upon which the prosecution is based, so far as applicable to the case in hand, is as follows: "Each officer of this state, or of any county, town or district of this state, and every other person charged with the receipt, safe keeping, transfer or disbursement of public moneys, who either * * * (9) willfully omits to transfer the same when such transfer is required by law; or, (10) willfully omits or refuses to pay over to any officer or person authorized by law to receive the same, any money received by him under any duty imposed by law so to pay over the same; is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than ten years, and is disqualified from holding any office in this state." The contention of counsel for appellant is that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence. Their position may be epitomized thus: (1) The money in question was not public money. (2) There was and is no law requiring a county clerk, upon the expiration of his term of office, to transfer to his successor in office public money in his hands. (3) The successor in office of defendant was not authorized by law to receive the money in question, and there was no duty imposed by law upon defendant to pay over to his successor such money.

It appears that the money which it is alleged the defendant failed to account for to his successor in the office of county clerk was received by said defendant, while county clerk, as deposits from litigants, to cover anticipated costs in cases pending in the superior court of the county of San Diego; and it is contended there was not at that time any law which authorized the defendant, as county clerk, to demand or receive such deposits, and therefore, being illegally collected, no duty devolved upon him, under the law, to pay the same to his successor in office; that such money belonged to litigants, and should have been returned to them, or if received under color of office, and not claimed by such litigants, it should have been paid to the county treasurer. On March 31, 1876, a fee bill was passed by the legislature for the county of San Diego. St. 1875-76, p. 586. By section 3 of that act the clerk of the district court was authorized to demand and receive from the plaintiff in each case, at the commencement of an action, a sum of not exceeding $10, to cover costs, and from the defendant the sum of $3, etc. The statute then provided as follows: "Any excess of fees advanced by either party, on the determination of the action, shall be returned by the clerk to the party who advanced them, on demand." It seems to be conceded that under the county government act of 1885, as amended up to 1889, and during the period of defendant's incumbency of the office of county clerk, viz. from January, 1889, to January, 1891, the county of San Diego was a county of the thirty-first class. The amendments of March 16, 1889, to the county government act, fixed the salary of the county clerk and of other officers in counties of the thirty-first class, but made no provision as to the fees to be collected, and did not provide for a deposit to cover fees, except in three classes of counties, of which the thirty-first is not one. St. 1889, p. 232. There was nothing in the county government act, up to 1891, which repealed or was inconsistent with the fee bill of 1876, supra, and our attention is not called to any other statute bearing upon the question. The county clerks were ex officio clerks of the district court, in their respective counties, under our former constitution, and under the constitution of 1879 the county clerks are ex officio clerks of the courts of record in and for their respective counties. Section 14 of article 6. Article 22 also provides that all laws in force at the adoption of the constitution, not inconsistent therewith, should remain in force until altered or repealed, and section 11 of the same article provides as follows: "All laws relative to the present judicial system of this state shall be applicable to the judicial system created by this constitution until changed by legislature." The fee bill of 1876, applicable to the county of San Diego so far as it provided for the fees to be paid to the clerk of the district court, and the deposit to be made with him at the commencement of each suit therein, etc., was a law relating to the judicial system of the state, and was not only kept in force by the constitution of 1879, but made applicable to the courts organized thereunder. The conclusion is therefore reached that the defendant, as county clerk of the county of San Diego, was authorized, under the act of March 31, 1876, to demand and receive the deposits in question for the purposes and subject to the disposition therein and by law provided.

We are also of opinion the deposits were received by the clerk in his official capacity, and under color of his office as clerk of the superior court, and, if not used in the payment of fees accruing in the cases in which they were deposited, or demanded by the depositors, should have been paid over by defendant to their proper custodian. In People v. Van Ness, 79 Cal. 85, 21 Pac. 554, it appeared that the defendant, as commissioner of immigration for the port of San Francisco, had, under color of his office, illegally collected certain fees for administering oaths to ship captains, for which there was no authority of law, and this court held that "the money, having been collected under color of office, should have been paid into the state treasury, and did not belong, in any view, to Van Ness, and he had no right to retain it. * * * It really belonged to the shipmasters of whom it was collected; but the state, in whose name and by whose authority it was pretended to have been collected, was the proper custodian of such moneys."

The next question involved relates to the duty of the defendant to turn over to his successor in office the money in question. The gravamen of the charge in the information is that it was the duty of the defendant, imposed by law, to transfer the money in question to his successor in office; that he willfully, fraudulently, and feloniously neglected and refused to transfer or pay the same to his successor, etc. We have searched in vain for any law making it the duty of the defendant to pay over public moneys in his hands to his successor in office. Section 16 of article 11 of the constitution makes it the duty of officers to deposit with the county treasurer, to the credit of the county, all moneys, assessments, and taxes belonging to or collected for the county. Yarnell v. City of Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 603, 25 Pac. 767. Section 70 of the county government act provides that the county treasurer "must receive all moneys belonging to the county, and all other moneys by law directed to be paid to him, safely keep the same," etc. Section 165 of the same act provides that "all salaried officers of the several counties of this state shall charge and collect for the use of their respective counties, and pay into the county treasury on the first Monday in each month, the fees now or hereafter allowed by law in all cases, except the percentage hereinbefore allowed such officers, and excepting also such fees as are a charge against the county." The county clerk of San Diego county was a salaried officer, and received no fees to his own use. Section 167 of the same act provided for a statement and affidavit upon payment to the treasurer. Under section 1014 of the Political Code, it becomes the duty of the county clerk, in common with other public officers, to surrender and deliver to his successor the possession of all books and papers pertaining to his office, or in his custody by virtue of his office; and if he willfully and unlawfully withholds any records, papers, documents, or other writings from his successor in office, he is, under section 76 of the Penal Code, guilty of a felony. The clerk is not a financial custodian of public moneys, except as to fees, etc., collected or received by him to the use of the county, and for which it is his duty to account with the treasurer on the first Monday of each month. No statute is pointed out or suggested, under which it is made his duty, at any time or under any circumstances, to pay over public money in his hands to his successor in office. The most that can be said is that the law ought to have provided, in cases like the present, for paying to the successor in the office of county clerk such sums of money placed on deposit as security for fees as have not been exhausted in payment for services rendered; but the answer is that, however desirable, there was no such law up to the date of the expiration of defendant's term of office, viz. January 5, 1891. The amendments to the county government act since the last-named date, and which, in many of the counties at least, provide for or obviate the difficulties of the present case, need not concern us at present.

It follows that defendant's successor in the office of county clerk was not the custodian of the moneys alleged to have been collected by the defendant as aforesaid during his term of office, and to neglect or refuse to pay to him the moneys in question constituted no violation of law, and the motion of counsel for defendant to advise an acquittal should have been granted; and as the court refused at the request of defendant to charge the jury that there was no law requiring the defendant to turn over to his successor in office the money in question, and as it did instruct that "the county clerk was the legal custodian of such funds, and the defendant, as such county clerk, was bound by law to pay over the same to his successor, and the latter was and is entitled to demand and receive the same," the verdict is against law and evidence. Defendant could not, under the information, be convicted for a failure to pay these moneys to the county treasurer, for the reasons: (1) He was not charged in the information with any neglect or refusal so to do. (2) There is no evidence of any such refusal, but, on the contrary, there is some uncontradicted evidence in the record that the county treasurer refused to receive such money on the ground that the fees had not been earned, and did not belong to the county.

The court below, on motion of defendant, arrested the judgment in this case, whereupon an appeal was taken to this court, and the action of the court below was reversed. The case is not reported, but may be found in 32 Pac. 526. It is claimed by counsel for the people that the very question presented here was involved in that appeal, and that, as the court held the information sufficient, it became and is the law of the case, and, even if "wrong becomes res adjudicata and final." I do not so understand the ruling. The opinion in that case, after referring to the objections made to the information, and commenting upon them, uses the following language: "Respondent further contends that, if the facts hereinbefore referred to were insufficiently pleaded, still the information does not state sufficient facts, because there was no law authorizing the clerk to receive deposits from litigants, and that, therefore, deposits received by him were illegally collected, and belonged to the depositors. But this question is not before us. This appeal involves only the sufficiency of the information and the jurisdiction of the court, while this contention assumes facts which may have been given in evidence, but which could not properly be considered upon this appeal if they were. The allegation that defendant received these moneys in his official capacity was sufficient, without referring, by title or otherwise, either to the statute under which the information was drawn, or to any statute which created a right, duty, or obligation, the antecedent existence of which may constitute a factor more or less intimately connected with the offense. As to all these the general conclusion of the information 'Contra formam statuti,' is sufficient." If the legality of the deposits with defendant was not in question, by parity of reasoning the legality of the demand and refusal to pay over the deposits by defendant to his successor was not involved. Besides, that question was not, so far as appears from the opinion, either raised or decided. It is not doubted but that a ruling by the appellate court upon a point distinctly made upon a previous appeal is, in all subsequent proceedings in the same case, a final adjudication, from the consequences of which the court cannot depart, nor the parties relieve themselves. Phelan v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 40; Davidson v. Dallas, 15 Cal. 75. But this rule does not apply to points not made or passed upon the former appeal (Anderson v. Hancock, 64 Cal. 455, 2 Pac. 31), or to new points presented on a second appeal (Ehrlich v. Ewald, 66 Cal. 98, 4 Pac. 1062), or to questions of fact (Mitchell v. Davis, 23 Cal. 381; Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal., at page 629). It follows that the points made here are not concluded by the decision on the former appeal. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and, as no conviction can be had under the information, the court below should be directed to dismiss the cause.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. ROYCE. (No. 21,081.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 14, 1894.)

EMBEZZLEMENT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—HARMLESS ERROR — SOLDIERS' HOME — DRAFT FOR MONEY APPROPRIATED BY CONGRESS—VALIDITY

1. On the trial of R. for embezzling part of the proceeds of a draft for $10.350, drawn by the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers on the assistant treasurer of the United States, payable to the order of M., governor of California, while defendant was treasurer of the Veterans' Home Association, a corporation organized under the laws of such state, M.'s private secretary testified that M. received a draft for such association; that he forwarded it to R.; that he had not seen it since; that it was received from the National Soldiers' Home Association; and that it was No. 71,228, on the assistant treasurer of the United States for $10,350, for the Yountville Soldiers' Home, signed by such assistant treasurer, indorsed by M. The president of a certain bank testified that the draft was deposited by R., and the entries of its description were made in the bank's books, and that on the same day it was sent to the bank's correspondent in the city and state of New York, and he had not seen it since. Held, that it was not error to permit such president to state also on whom such draft was drawn, against objections that it did not appear that the draft ever reached New York or was beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

2. It was shown that, at the time of the alleged embezzlement, defendant was treasurer of the Soldiers' Home Association; that such association had established its home at Yountville; and that there was no other home for soldiers there. H. testified that the draft was for the Veterans' Home Association, and in his letter transmitting it to defendant called it the "Yountville Soldiers' Home," while defendant signed the acknowledgment of its receipt as "Treasurer Veterans' Home of California." A witness testified that in the ledger of the Veterans' Home Association, under the date on which the draft was cashed, there was in his handwriting an entry of $10,310.35; that he got the information from which the entry was made from defendant; and that "the amount he gave me as the statement of that warrant was $10,310.35." The president of the bank testified that the only indorsements it kept were "R., Treasurer of Yountville Soldiers' Home, and M." Held, that it was not error to permit such president to also state the amount paid to defendant for such draft, against an objection that there was no evidence that the draft was the property of the Veterans' Home Association.

3. On such trial, a question arose as to a check drawn by defendant on the bank in which such draft was deposited, which the bank claimed had been returned to him. The state then called on defendant to produce the check, but the demand was not pressed, and the court did not require defendant to produce it. Held that, if such demand was erroneous, defendant was not prejudiced.

4. Act Cong. Aug. 27, 1888 (25 Stat. 450), "to provide aid to state or territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors," after making an appropriation for such purpose, provides that payments to states and territories shall be made quarterly by the board of managers of the National Home to the officers of the states and territories entitled, duly authorized to receive them. By Act Cal. March 19, 1889, the home of the Veterans' Home Association, located at Yountville, Napa county, was recognized and declared to be a "state home for the support and maintenance of disabled soldiers and sailors," and to be under the exclusive management of the state, "by the board of directors of said association, who are hereby constituted a state board of directors for that purpose;" and the state treasurer was authorized to receive any and all money to which such home may be entitled under such act of congress. Held, that such draft was not void and of no value, on the ground that the money appropriated by congress, when paid, becomes the state's money, and goes into its treasury, and that it is impossible for such corporation to acquire any right to such money.

5. Nor does the fact that such draft was drawn to the order of the governor, instead of the state treasurer, as required by the act of congress appropriating the money, aid defendant; since defendant received the draft as such treasurer, and received the entire proceeds, and is estopped to deny the validity of the draft, or that the money belonged to the association.

6. The facts that defendant was only required to report to the association at stated periods, and that the time for reporting the receipt of the money alleged to have been embezzled had not arrived, do not prevent the state from showing by positive proof that defendant has embezzled it.

7. It was not necessary for the state to show that, before the finding of the indictment, defendant did not pay over all moneys received by him as treasurer of such association; nor to show what disposition he made of it after appropriating it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

C. E. K. Royce was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Affirmed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The indictment charged that appellant was treasurer of the Veterans' Home Association, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of this state; and that on the 24th day of February, 1893, he embezzled the sum of $2,050, the property of said association, which came to his hands by virtue of his trust as such treasurer. The facts, as claimed by the prosecution, were that a certain draft drawn by the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers upon the assistant treasurer of the United States, at the city of New York, payable to the order of H. H. Markham, governor of the state of California, for the sum of $10,350, came to the hands of the defendant, as such treasurer, on the 21st day of February, 1893; that on that day he procured the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, in San Francisco, to cash the draft, the proceeds of which he caused to be deposited to his individual account in said bank, the amount alleged to have been embezzled being part of said proceeds. The errors complained of are based upon rulings upon questions of evidence, and upon instructions to the jury.

M. R. Higgins, a witness for the prosecution, testified as follows: "I am the private secretary of Governor Markham. On or about the month of February of this year, Governor Markham received a draft for the Veterans' Home Association, which afterwards came into my hands. I don't know where that draft is now. Q. What did you do with that draft? A. I forwarded it to Mr. Royce, the treasurer of the Yountville Soldiers' Home, or the Veterans' Home Association of California, or whatever the name is. I forwarded it on the 20th of February, 1893, and think I have Mr. Royce's receipt for it, dated February 21, 1893. I have not seen the draft since. It was received from the National Soldiers' Home Association, through General Franklin, at Hartford, Conn., to whom the governor receipted for it. The draft was No. 71,228, on the assistant treasurer of the United States, for $10,350, for the Yountville Soldiers' Home, for 414 members, from October 1, 1892, to December 31, 1892, three months, at one hundred dollars per annum, no pensions retained, signed by the assistant treasurer of the United States (I don't know his name), indorsed by H. H. Markham." William H. Crocker, president of the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, a witness for the prosecution, testified: "Q. Do you remember whether the bank cashed the draft to Colonel Royce? A. Yes, sir; I do. That was on the 21st of February, of this year. That draft was deposited by Mr. Royce. The entries of the description of the draft were made in our books, and that day sent for credit to our New York correspondent, the National Park Bank. I have not seen the draft since. Q. Now, on whom was that draft drawn?" Counsel for defendant objected to any description of the draft being given, because it did not appear that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the court. The witness, in reply to the court, said he meant the city of New York and state of New York. Counsel then added to his objection that it is not proved that it ever reached the state of New York. The objection was properly overruled. Conceding that the evidence did not show that the draft was in the state of New York, it did show that it was not in the possession of the witness, and this was sufficient for the purposes for which the evidence was intended. The defendant was not charged with embezzling the draft, but with embezzling certain moneys which he received, being the proceeds of a draft transmitted to him by Mr. Higgins; and the evidence called for was for the purpose of identifying the draft cashed by the bank as the same draft the defendant had that day received from Mr. Higgins. The object of the evidence was not to determine a contract liability created by the writing, and involving a construction of its very language, though it might have furnished evidence that the association was the owner of the proceeds. This, however, was sufficiently shown by other testimony afterwards given, but which will now be noticed as an illustration of the point under discussion. Mr. Higgins, resuming, testified: "I sent that check to Mr. Royce, by direction of Governor Markham, as his private secretary, and wrote a letter accompanying the draft. Copy of letter offered in evidence, and is in the words and figures following, to wit: 'February 20, 1893. Colonel C. E. K. Royce, Crocker Building, San Francisco—Dear Sir: I am directed by the governor to inclose you check No. 71,228, of assistant treasurer of the United States, for $10,350, for Yountville Soldiers' Home, for 414 members, from October first, 1892, to December thirty-first, 1892, three months, at $100 per annum. No pensions retained. Yours, very truly, M. R. Higgins, Private Secretary.' The witness: To that letter I received the following reply: 'San Francisco, February 21, 1893. W. R. Higgins, Esq., Private Secretary, Sacramento, Cal.—Dear Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of check No. 71,228, on assistant treasurer of the United States, for $10,350, indorsed by H. H. Markham, governor of the state of California, for the Veterans' Home of California. Very truly yours, C. E. K. Royce, Treasurer Veterans' Home of California.'" It will here be seen that defendant's letter to Mr. Higgins is an admission that as treasurer of the Veterans' Home of California he received the draft described by Mr. Higgins in his letter of transmission, and that he received it for the purposes named; and oral evidence tending to identify that as the draft delivered to the bank is primary and admissible.

In Com. v. Morrill, 99 Mass. 544, it was said: "The law generally requires the production of the highest evidence of which a thing is capable; and evidence is to be excluded which supposes still higher evidence behind in the possession or power of the party. But the rule is far from universal. For example, it does not require that a supposed writer shall be called to prove his own handwriting, or that a person whose identity is to be proved shall be produced in court. The same is true in respect to an animal or any other object the identity of which is to be proved." In the case above cited, a valise had been stolen, and was shipped by express from Massachusetts to Chicago. The express agent attached a tag to the valise marked "B. Anthony, Chicago, Ill.," as requested by the defendant. The valise was found in Chicago by a detective, who removed the tag, but at the time of the trial did not find it, and oral evidence was admitted of the writing upon the tag. An exception was reserved. The supreme court said: "In the present case the tag referred to was not a document, but an object to be identified. The words written upon it served to identify it; and the court are of opinion that oral evidence was admissible for this purpose, and that it was not necessary to produce the tag. An inspection of the tag, with the written direction upon it, might have been more satisfactory to the jry than an oral description of it, and therefore might be regarded as the stronger evidence; but the strength of evidence and the admissibility of evidence are different matters." In Singleton v. Barrett, 2 Cromp. & J. 368, Lord Lyndhurst said: "If a person give a receipt, you may prove the payment by parol. I have no doubt that what a party says admitting a debt is evidence, notwithstanding the promise to pay is reduced into writing." The supreme court of the United States said: "It cannot be laid down as a universal rule that, where written evidence of a fact exists, all parol evidence of the same fact must be excluded. Suppose the defendant had written a letter to the plaintiff acknowledging the receipt of money; it certainly could not be pretended that the production of this letter would be indispensable, and exclude all parol evidence of the advance." Keene v. Meade, 3 Pet. 7. In the case at bar, suppose that Mr. Higgins, instead of sending the draft to the defendant by mail, had personally handed it to him, and, having taken his written acknowledgment showing that he received it as treasurer, and the amount of it, had gone with him to the bank, and there saw him hand the same draft to Mr. Crocker, and obtain credit for the amount of it; could there be any question that such evidence would be competent to prove the identity of the draft delivered to defendant with the one discounted? If so, it was competent for Mr. Crocker to identify it by giving a description of it.

It is also contended that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the question, "What was the amount paid to Col. Royce for that draft?" for the reason that "there was no evidence that the draft belonged to, or was the property of, the Veterans' Home Association;" and this because defendant's receipt to Mr. Higgins was signed, "Treasurer Veterans' Home of California." This, it is said, is not the name of the corporation, and shows that the draft did not belong to the Veterans' Home Association. Mr. Crocker also testified: "The only indorsements that we kept were 'C. E. K. Royce, Treasurer Yountville Soldiers' Home,' and 'H. H. Markham.'" It was shown that, at the time of this transaction, the defendant was treasurer of the Veterans' Home Association; that the association had established its home at Yountville; and that there was no other home for soldiers at Yountville. Mr. Higgins, in his oral testimony, said the draft was for the "Veterans' Home Association," and in his letter transmitting the draft to the defendant called it the "Yountville Soldiers' Home;" while the defendant signed the acknowledgment of its receipt as "Treasurer Veterans' Home of California." But, if this evidence could create any doubt that these names were each used to designate the same association, the testimony of Mr. Horton that in the ledger of the Veterans' Home Association, under date of February 21st, in the handwriting of the witness, there is an entry of $10,310.35; that he got the information from which the entry was made from defendant; and that "the amount he gave me as the statement of that warrant was $10,310.35,"—sufficiently shows that he received it as the treasurer of the Veteran's Home Association.

It may be here stated that the proceeds of the draft, including a premium of $10.35, credited to defendant by the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, were $10,360.35, and that defendant deposited to the account of the association in the First National Bank his check on the first-named bank for $8,310.35, leaving unaccounted for the amount charged in the indictment. Upon the trial, a question arose as to a check drawn by defendant upon the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank which the bank claimed had been returned to defendant. The prosecution then called upon the defendant to produce the check. Counsel for defendant objected, and took an exception to the district attorney calling upon the defendant to produce evidence against himself. In 3 Russ. Crimes (9th Ed.) p. 233, it is said: "It has been solemnly determined that notice may be given to the defendant in a criminal prosecution to produce a paper in his possession, and, in case he neglects to produce it, other evidence may be given of it." The defendant, however, was not required to produce the check. It is argued, however, that such a demand is liable to prejudice the defendant; and McGinnis v. State, 24 Ind. 503, is cited. In that case the defendant was charged with stealing a United States treasury note, of the denomination of $10. Upon appeal, it was assigned for error "that the court erred in admitting parol evidence of the contents of the United States treasury note alleged to have been stolen, no foundation having been laid for such proof, and no notice served upon the defendant to produce the note." It was held that the court could not compel the defendant in a criminal prosecution to produce an instrument in writing, in his possession, to be used against him, but that parol evidence may be given of the contents without such notice having been given. The question whether it would be error to make such demand was not before the court. In the case at bar the demand was not pressed, and we do not see how the defendant was prejudiced, even if it be conceded that such demand constituted error. The exception was to the demand of the district attorney, and not to any action of the court. If the court had directed the defendant to produce the check, or if the district attorney had commented to the jury upon the defendant's failure to produce the check, a different question would have been presented.

It is also contended that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction, requested by the defendant: "The court instructs you, as matter of law, that the draft or check, referred to in the evidence as No. 71,228 was void and of no value, and not the subject of embezzlement." The same question was made upon the introduction of evidence, where it was said that the draft was void because "issued without any authority of law." The draft in question was drawn by the board of managers of the National Home, under section 2 of an act of congress entitled "An act to provide aid to state or territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States," approved August 27, 1888 (25 Stat. 450). This act, after making an appropriation for that purpose, further provided: "And payments to the states and territories under it shall be made quarterly by the said board of managers of the National Home * * * to the officers of the respective states or territories entitled, duly authorized to receive such payments. * * *" By an act approved March 19, 1889, the home of the Veterans' Home Association, located at Yountville, Napa county, was recognized and declared to be a "state home for the support and maintenance of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States," and to be under the exclusive management of the state, "through and by the board of directors of said association, who are hereby constituted a state board of directors for that purpose;" and the state treasurer was authorized and empowered to receive any and all money to which said home may be entitled under said act of congress. It is argued by appellant that this money, "when paid, becomes the money of the state, and goes into its treasury;" that "it is impossible for this corporation to acquire any right to any of the money appropriated by said act of congress." We think it clear that the act of 1889, above cited, creates the corporation a state agency for the management of the home, and the disbursement of all moneys appropriated for its support, whether by the state or the United States, or donated by individuals or societies. The act does not destroy or impair the existence or powers of the corporation. The state is limited by the act to the one specified mode of control, viz. "through and by the board of directors of said association;" and section 4 provides that "this act shall in no wise affect the title to the property of the association." It is not necessary to decide the question whether the association is the absolute owner of moneys coming to its hands, either from the state or the United States. It is authorized to receive moneys for a specified use or purpose. Conceding that it is a trustee of such moneys, its title as such trustee is quite sufficient to support an indictment for the larceny or embezzlement of the same.

It is contended, however, that money cannot be drawn from the treasury of the United States otherwise than in the manner provided by law; and the draft, having been drawn to the order of the governor, instead of the state treasurer, was void, and the United States lost nothing,—that is, that the money remained the property of the United States; that the Veterans' Home Association was not entitled to it, and its treasurer had not authority to receive the draft or obtain money upon it; and therefore the United States, though the owner of the money, could maintain no action against the association to recover it, nor could the association recover it from the defendant. The argument is ingenious, but does not aid the appellant. Whether the government was bound to recognize and pay the draft we need not consider. If the government had reclaimed the draft while it was in defendant's possession, upon the ground that it was issued without authority, it would have been a good defense to this prosecution. It was not so reclaimed, but defendant received the draft as the treasurer of the association, and received the entire proceeds; and, having received it as such treasurer, he is estopped from saying that it was not a valid draft, or that the proceeds were not the moneys of the association. If the draft was void upon its face, as contended by counsel, the defendant should not have received it; but having received it in the name and on behalf of the association, and having received the full amount of money specified in it, he cannot escape responsibility by saying either that the association was not entitled to the money, or that he was not authorized to receive it as treasurer. In Ex parte Hedley, 31 Cal. 108, it was held that if an agent obtains the money of his principal in the capacity of agent, but in a manner not authorized by the agency, he may commit embezzlement of it; and in People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 10 Pac. 502, the defendant was the agent of Hanneke to receive money upon a claim which Hanneke held against Quinn, and received money from Quinn as such agent. Afterwards Hanneke assigned the claim to Wise, and the defendant, without informing Quinn of the assignment, continued to receive payments, receipting therefor in the name of Hanneke; and it was held that he was estopped in law from denying that the money received after the assignment he received as the agent of Hanneke. The court there quoted from Bish. Cr. Law, § 397 (in 8th Ed., vol. 2, § 364): "In reason, whenever a man claims to be a servant while getting into his possession by force of this claim the property to be embezzled, he should be held to be such on his trial for the embezzlement. * * * When a man has received a thing of another under the claim of agency, he cannot turn round and tell the principal, asking for the thing: 'Sir, I was not your agent in taking it, but a deceiver and a scoundrel.'" People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 235, 10 Pac. 502. See, also, People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 470, 471, 35 Pac. 80.

What we have said disposes of the defendant's requests numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 7. Other instructions requested by defendant seem to be based upon the theory that the defendant was only required to report to the association at stated periods; that the time for reporting the receipt of this money had not arrived; and that until he had failed to account for it, or to pay it over to his successor, it could not be shown that he had embezzled it; and that in the meantime he might keep it in any safe place he saw fit. It is said in support of these propositions that the jury should know what the defendant's duties were before proceeding to determine whether he had violated his duties or his trust. There are doubtless many cases where an embezzlement can only be proved through the failure of the agent to account for or pay over the money received, but that goes only to the evidence, and not to the fact of the embezzlement, which may be proved by other evidence long before the period for accounting arrives, and before his successor could be elected or qualified. People v. Tomlinson, 66 Cal. 344, 5 Pac. 509, only decides a question of evidence, viz. that the refusal of the agent to pay over the money of his principal, when demanded by a person not authorized to receive it, is not evidence of embezzlement. Non constat that he may have in fact embezzled it before the demand, and that it was capable of other and positive proof.

The twenty-first request was properly refused. It asked the court to instruct the jury that there was no evidence that the defendant did not, prior to the finding of the indictment, pay over all moneys received by him as treasurer of the association. If the defendant, on the 24th day of February, embezzled and converted to his own use the moneys of the association, how could it affect his guilt in the eye of the law if he afterwards repented and restored the money? The court correctly charged the jury that: "When proof has been made to the satisfaction of the jury that the defendant did fraudulently appropriate to his own use the moneys of said corporation, contrary to his trust as its treasurer, it is not necessary for the prosecution to show further what disposition has been made of the money by the defendant after such fraudulent appropriation."

It is further contended that the court erred in not granting defendant's motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to law, because the court refused to instruct the jury "that the treasurer was authorized only to receive moneys appropriated or contributed to the objects of the association; and that the treasurer was not authorized, and it was no part of his trust, to receive money to which the association had no right or title; and that, if the defendant received money to which the association had no right, title, or claim, it could not be an act done by virtue of his trust." Here, again, the appellant's theory is that the money belonged to the state, and not to the association. This contention cannot be sustained. The act of congress imposed no restriction upon the state as to the channel or agency through which the money should be applied to the purposes designated in the act. It required no appropriation by the state legislature before the money could be used in support of the home. The money was appropriated by congress, and could not be diverted by the state. The veterans in the home were the beneficiaries of the fund from the moment it left the United States treasury, and the state itself could not divert it; and, as the inmates of the home could only receive it through the agency of the association, the association was entitled to its custody and use for the purpose for which it was appropriated, and such custody and use required and constituted ownership. The language of the act of the legislature of March, 1889, is: "The state treasurer is hereby authorized and empowered to receive any and all moneys to which said home may be entitled under the act of congress, the state thereby treating it as the property of the home, and recognizing the fact that the state is the mere conduit through which it is transmitted to the association."

We find no error which would justify a reversal, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LACEY v. PORTER. (No. 19,325.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1894.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PROVINCE OF JURY.

1. Plaintiff was, at defendant's instance, arrested for threatening to enter on land in which defendant was interested, and detain the same by force. Plaintiff was a member of a society formed to take possession of the land, and a surveyor had been employed by the society to survey the land, and had surveyed a portion of it. Held, that the testimony of the surveyor as to acts and declarations of members of the society, in plaintiff's absence, regarding the intention of the society to take possession of the land, was admissible.

2. In an action for malicious prosecution, the credibility of witnesses, and the questions of malice, motives, and intention should be left to the jury only where the evidence for plaintiff is sufficient to support a verdict in his favor.

3. The question of malice is one of fact, and that of probable cause one of law.

4. In an action for causing plaintiff's arrest for threatening to enter on land and detain the same by force and violence, evidence that, when arrested, plaintiff was a member of a society the purpose of which was to take possession of the land; that plaintiff, with 14 other men and a team loaded with lumber, was going on the land when stopped by defendant; and that one of the party told defendant he might as well yield, as they had 300 or 400 men, and would go on the land,—showed probable cause for plaintiff's arrest.

5. Taking the advice of counsel before causing a person's arrest on a criminal charge tends to show good faith; and where the facts are fully stated to counsel, and his advice is acted on in good faith, there can be no recovery for malicious prosecution.

6. Where, in an action for malicious prosecution, probable cause is shown, no amount of malice will entitle plaintiff to recover.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. Wade, Judge.

Action by James Lacey against George K. Porter for malicious prosecution. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Adams & Mitchell, for appellant. Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland (S. M. White, of counsel), for respondent.

HAYNES, C. On October 13, 1891, defendant, Porter, made complaint against the plaintiff, Lacey, charging him with threatening to enter upon and detain by force and violence the lands of the Porter Land & Water Company, a corporation, in which Porter was a large stockholder. Upon this complaint, the justice of the peace issued a warrant, and Lacey was arrested the same day; but, being unable to give bail that evening, was committed to jail, where he remained 17 hours. He was afterwards examined before the justice, and discharged, and thereupon brought this action against Porter for malicious prosecution. A jury trial was had, and, at the conclusion of the evidence, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to render a verdict for the defendant. The instruction was given, and a verdict returned in compliance with the instruction, upon which judgment was entered. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying said motion. No complaint was made by plaintiff other than that the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause; and these questions, he contends, should have been submitted to the jury. Some questions arising upon the admission of evidence are also made.

The lands of the Porter Land & Water Company, above mentioned, are part of the Mexican grant known as the "Rancho Ex-Mission de San Fernando." This grant was confirmed by the United States, and a patent therefor was issued in 1873, and was duly recorded in the recorder's office in Los Angeles county in 1876. The south half of the grant (generally known as the "Van Nuys Tract") is owned by the Los Angeles Farming & Milling Company. The lands of the Porter Land & Water Company are in the north half of the grant, and adjoin the Van Nuys tract. Other portions of the north half are held by individuals, among whom are Hubbard and Wright, who also own a tract the south boundary of which is the Van Nuys tract, and all held under titles derived by mesne conveyances from the patentee. At and prior to the time of the arrest, the plaintiff was a member of an organization called the "San Fernando Protective Association," which then had a membership variously stated at from 200 to 400 men. This organization had a written constitution, and all the officers usually had by voluntary associations, including a treasurer, to whom all moneys were to be paid over by the secretary, and who disbursed the same on orders drawn by the association. The membership fee was $15, upon the payment of which a person was entitled to a membership certificate. The dues were $5 per quarter. The object of the association, as stated in the preamble to the constitution, was "to have the title to certain portions of the lands of the San Fernando valley declared invalid, and open to settlement and entry as public lands;" or, as stated by the plaintiff in his testimony: "I think the association was for the purpose of jumping the land." Each member was restricted to 160 acres; but, if he desired more, he was required to pay to the secretary $25 for each additional 160 acres he might select. The land referred to in the preamble above quoted, and in the testimony of the plaintiff, was the said Mexican grant so confirmed and patented by the United States. Prior to the arrest of the plaintiff, the association had employed a surveyor, named Grove, who surveyed and subdivided the south half of the grant; and it, or a large portion of it, was allotted to members of the association, in individual parcels of 160 acres each; and, on and prior to October 8th, 50 or 60 houses or shanties had been erected and occupied by members of the association on that part of the grant.

The character of the entry upon and occupation of these lands is not doubtful. It was the unlawful and forcible entry by large numbers of persons, organized and banded together for that purpose, upon the peaceable and actual possession of another, whose title was evidenced by the patent of the United States, as was well known to the association. Nor were these lands wild and unimproved, but for many years, certainly for 15 or 20 years, had been regularly cultivated, and at the time of entry the stubble of the preceding harvest was upon the ground. The purposes of the association, however, were not confined to the south half of the grant. Whether the occupation of the south half before any open attempt to enter upon the north half was because of that part having been first surveyed, or whether it was for the better protection of the invaders by the proximity of their locations, it is not essential to inquire. On October 7, 1891, Shaffer, a member of the association, having made a selection of land on the north side from a map, went with two other members to find it, and on that occasion met Mr. Wright, one of the owners of the Hubbard & Wright tract, with whom they had some words. On the next day, Grove, the surveyor, with about 15 men (among whom were Shaffer, with a load of lumber, and the plaintiff), came to the south line of section 26, part of which section belonged to Hubbard & Wright and part to the Porter Land & Water Company, where they were met by Mr. Wilson, the superintendent of the Porter Land & Water Company, and Mr. Wright, who stopped them. Grove, who did the talking for the crowd, said they had come to settle on section 26; that they might as well let them go on there peaceably; that they were going on there anyhow; that he had 300 or 400 men belonging to the league, and had plenty of money back of them. The talk continued until between sundown and dark, when the crowd turned back. The next morning, Grove and the plaintiff, with several others, came again to the line. Plaintiff was head chainman. They had surveyed up to the line, and had gone about a half chain over, when Wilson, for the Porter Land & Water Company, forbade them going over the line, and pulled up a pin that had been stuck north of the line, and threw it back across the line. Plaintiff then went back across the line and said: "I ain't a bit afraid of you. I'll give you a pointer on that." Grove said (but not in the presence of plaintiff) that, if he had given the word the day before, his men would have gone on the land too quick, and that they (Wright and Wilson) would not have been anywhere; that his men were all armed; that they were coming again on Monday, and they might just as well let them go there and settle; that they considered it government land, and they calculated to go on it. The defendant, Porter, consulted the district attorney, and for that purpose visited his office two or three times, and was advised by him that he had a legal remedy, and directed the assistant district attorney to prepare a form of complaint to be used by defendant to procure warrants for the arrest of plaintiff and others, and such form was prepared, and was used to procure plaintiff's arrest. Grove, the surveyor, and several others, were included in the same complaint. Other facts, so far as material to be noticed, will be referred to in the examination of the points made by appellant.

The errors relied upon by appellant are (as stated in his brief):

1. "The admission of testimony showing the acts and declarations (made without the hearing of appellant), by members of the protective association and others, of the intention of the association to take possession of respondent's land, no conspiracy having been shown." The constitution of the association was put in evidence by the plaintiff, and he admitted that he was a member, and that the object of the association was to "jump the land." Grove, it is true, was not a member of the association, but was its employé, aiding and assisting it, and having full knowledge of its existence and purposes; and all the statements and acts, whether of Grove or of the members of the association, were made and done while they were engaged in the accomplishment of the common design. Appellant was not only a member of the association, but was actively participating in what was being done, and it was not necessary to the admissibility of the declarations of the others that he should have been present and within hearing, even if he had been on trial upon the charge made against him.

2. It is further insisted that the court erred in "taking from the jury the questions of the credibility of witnesses, malice, motives, intention, and belief of respondent, and what facts the evidence established." The general rule undoubtedly is that these questions should be submitted to the jury where evidence is conflicting; but it is equally well settled that the court may within certain limits control the verdict, either by such an instruction as was here given, or by setting it aside, and granting a new trial, either upon motion of the defeated party or upon its own motion. To justify the court in directing a verdict, it is not necessary that there should be no conflict in the evidence; but, where the evidence is such that it is clearly insufficient to support a verdict in favor of the party against whom the direction is given, the instruction is proper, unless the circumstances of the case indicate that upon another trial the evidence may be materially different, in which case the facts should be submitted to the jury in order that a new trial may be had. But in either case the decision of the court below will be sustained, unless the appellate court can clearly see that its conclusion is wrong upon the facts. "In an action for malicious prosecution, the burden is on the plaintiff to show affirmatively that there was a want of probable cause." Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 656; Emerson v. Skaggs, 52 Cal. 247. "Actions for malicious prosecution have never been favored in law, although they have always been readily upheld when the proper elements therefor have been presented. They are sustained, however, only when it is shown that the prosecution was in fact actuated by malice, and that the party instigating it had no reasonable ground for causing the prosecution." Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 228, 28 Pac. 937. Malice is a question of fact; but what facts and circumstances amount to probable cause is a pure question of law, though whether such facts and circumstances exist is a question of fact. Id., 93 Cal. 227, 28 Pac. 937; Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 84. The facts of the organization and purposes of the San Fernando Protective Association, that the Van Nuys tract had largely been occupied by members of the association acting in concert, that the purpose was also to occupy that part of the original grant then belonging to the Porter Land & Water Company, that Shaffer, accompanied by about 15 men, among whom were plaintiff and the surveyor, Grove, with a four-horse team loaded with lumber, were proceeding to go upon the land, when taken with the statements of Grove that the owners might as well yield peaceably, that he had 300 or 400 men, and would go on the land, all of which was shown without substantial contradiction, and all, except the statements of Grove last above referred to, by the testimony of the plaintiff, render it too plain for argument that defendant had probable cause for the arrest of plaintiff. It does not matter that no threat to occupy defendant's land was made by plaintiff personally, nor that he had already selected a quarter section on the other part of the tract. The occupation of the Van Nuys tract, in the manner described, with any movement towards the occupation of the other part of the grant with large numbers of men, was a threat to occupy it forcibly. Why should 15 men accompany one wagon load of lumber if the entry was intended to be lawful and peaceable? If the facts, as they existed, were such as to constitute probable cause, and the defendant acted thereon in good faith, it is not necessary to show that he consulted counsel. Taking the advice of counsel, however, tends to show good faith and honest motives and the absence of malice; and where the facts upon which a criminal complaint is based are fully stated to counsel, and his advice is acted upon in good faith, the plaintiff cannot recover. Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 235, 28 Pac. 937. But, if probable cause is found to exist, no amount of malice will entitle plaintiff to recover; for, though malice is inferred from want of probable cause, still where probable cause does exist, malice, even affirmatively shown, will not entitle the plaintiff to a verdict. Thompson v. Rubber Co., 56 Conn. 493, 16 Atl. 554. The circumstances relied upon by appellant to show malice on the part of defendant are insufficient for that purpose; but, as it is clear that probable cause for the arrest was shown, it is not necessary to discuss them. We think the instruction to find for defendant was right, and that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

JEFFERSON et al. v. HEWITT et ux. (No. 19,406.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1894.)

Review on Appeal — Evidence of Agency — Promissory Notes — Conditions — Failure of Consideration—Void Issue of Stock.

1. Findings of fact by the trial court upon conflicting evidence will not be reviewed on appeal.

2. The secretary of a corporation is acting as its agent where he solicits a stock subscription, turns over to the company a note given therefor, whereupon the president delivers the stock certificate to the purchaser, and such actions are thereafter ratified by the board.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 359, prohibiting the issue of stock except for money paid, labor done, or property actually received, a stock certificate issued in exchange for a note conditioned upon the completion of the road in a given time is void, and such note is without consideration.

4. The condition upon which a note is payable need not be incorporated therein.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court of Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by Amos E. Jefferson and others against R. E. Hewitt and wife. There was a judgment for defendants, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Houghton, Silent & Campbell, for appellants. James Scarborough and Ray Billingsly, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This action was brought by the assignees of a nonnegotiable note to recover from the makers the amount alleged to be due thereon. The note was for $5,000, dated July 14, 1888, and payable four months after date, and was given to the Santa Ana, Fairview & Pacific Railroad Company in payment for 50 shares of stock in that company. On the first trial, judgment was given for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed. The judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial (95 Cal. 535, 30 Pac. 772), the court, among other things, saying: "The construction of the road to the ocean was no part of the consideration of the note. The findings negative the averment of the answer that the note was given 'upon the express condition' that the railroad should be completed within ninety days. The matters relied upon, to be available as a defense, must be shown to have been a condition agreed upon by the parties." When the case went back to the court below the defendants filed an amended answer, in which, after making certain denials, they set up two affirmative defenses. In the first of these defenses, it is alleged that on July 14, 1888, defendants agreed with the Santa Ana, Fairview & Pacific Railroad Company to take 50 shares of its capital stock, and to deliver to said company their promise in writing to pay therefor the sum of $5,000, and in pursuance thereof did on the same day deliver the note set out in the complaint, but that said agreement to take said stock, and the performance of said written promise, were by the agreement of the parties thereto at the same time made conditional upon the construction and completion of the railroad of said company from Fairview, its terminus at that time, to the Pacific ocean, before the maturity of said note, to wit, within 60 or 90 days, and that it was expressly agreed by and between said parties, at the time of the delivery of said note, that if said railroad should not be so constructed and completed within said period the defendants would not have to pay said note, or any part thereof; that said condition was not performed, and the road was not constructed in whole or in part from Fairview to the Pacific ocean, within said period, or at all, and no part thereof has yet been built; that about September 10, 1888, defendants notified said company that said condition had not been performed, and no steps had been taken to comply with it, and thereafter, about November 15, 1888, and again about January 15, 1890, the said condition being still unperformed, they tendered to the officials of said company the said stock, and demanded the return of said note, which return was refused; "and defendants hereby renew the tender of said stock, and deposit the certificate for the same herewith in court, and demand the return of their promise in writing." In the second defense it is alleged that the same agreement was made as that set up in the first defense, but that said agreement and note were made upon the sole consideration of the promise and agreement of the company that it would complete its road from Fairview to the Pacific ocean before the maturity of said note, to wit, within 60 or 90 days from its date; that the company failed to so complete its road, or any part thereof, and by reason of such failure the consideration for said agreement to take stock and for said note had wholly failed; and the tendering back of the stock is then alleged in the same terms as before. The case was again tried, and the court found the facts as to the said agreement and note to be as alleged in the answer, and gave judgment for defendants, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal.

In support of the appeal the principal contention is that the findings were not justified by the evidence. This contention cannot, in our opinion, be sustained. The negotiations for the sale and purchase of the stock were all between Dr. J. G. Bailey, who was then the secretary and a director and stockholder of the company, and the defendants, and they were the only witnesses as to the terms of the agreement. The testimony of the defendants was clearly sufficient to justify and sustain the findings, and the most that can be said is that some conflict was raised by the testimony of Dr. Bailey. That, however, was a matter for solution by the trial court, and its determination cannot be reviewed on appeal.

It is also contended that, whatever the agreement between Dr. Bailey and the defendants may have been, the company was not bound by it, for the reason that he was not acting as its agent, and had no power to sell the stock, either conditionally or unconditionally. And counsel say: "The company would have been bound if it were true that Bailey was its agent in the transaction, having authority to bind it; but he is neither shown to have been its agent, nor to have had any authority whatever to act for it in the matter." Whether this is so or not must be determined from the evidence. The material facts shown by the evidence are, in substance, as follows: As already stated, Dr. Bailey was the acting secretary and a director of the company, and all the negotiations for the sale of the stock to defendants were had between him and them. There was some unsold stock of the company, and Bailey and the other members of the board had talked a good many times about disposing of it, and he and they had tried to sell stock to others. Bailey went to the defendants, and solicited and urged them to take the stock, and during the negotiations told them that he had the privilege or power to dispose of a part of the stock to his friends. He took the note to the company on the day he received it, and a few days later the president of the company, Mr. Buck, took the certificate of stock to Hewitt's house, and offered it to him. Hewitt then asked Buck if it was true that the company was going to continue the road on from Fairview to the beach within 60 or 90 days, as agreed and stated to him by Dr. Bailey, and Buck said, "The road is going right on, notwithstanding any reports to the contrary." Hewitt then took the certificate, and he says, "I thought I might just as well have the certificate of stock, although I was negotiating for stock as completed from Fairview to the beach." In September following, Hewitt wrote a letter to the board of directors of the company, and delivered it to Mr. Catts, its then secretary, stating: "I hereby beg leave to tender to you my stock in your company, issued to me on or about the 17th day of July last, and to the amount of five thousand dollars ($5,000). And I further ask you to cancel my note, given for the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000) for the said stock. My reason for this step is that the conditions and representations upon which the said stock was issued to me have not in any manner been fulfilled or carried into effect by your company." On the 8th of October following the directors of the company passed a resolution reading as follows: "Resolved, that the issue of certificate number 20, for fifty shares of the capital stock of this corporation, to R. E. Hewitt, on the 14th day of July, 1888, by the officers of this corporation, and the acceptance by them on behalf of this corporation of a certain promissory note made by R. E. Hewitt and Allie A. Hewitt, his wife, dated 14th day of July, 1888, for the sum of five thousand dollars, and given in payment in full for said shares of stock, be now by this board approved and ratified." These facts very clearly show, as we think, that Bailey, in making the agreement with the defendants in regard to the stock and the note, was acting as the agent of the company, with actual or ostensible authority to do so, and not as the agent of defendants; and it must be assumed that when he delivered the note to the company he notified its officers of the conditions agreed upon as to its payment. At any rate it was his duty to do so, and there is no evidence tending to show that he did not perform that duty. But, whether he did perform it or not, the company was bound by his action, since notice to an agent is constructive notice to the principal, and the rule applies to corporations as well as individuals. Civ. Code, § 2332; Bierce v. Hotel Co., 31 Cal. 165; 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. (2d Ed.) §§ 540b, 540c.

The point is made that when the defendants received the certificate of stock they became liable to pay for it, and the condition agreed upon as to payment, if made, was rendered void, leaving the obligation to pay in full force. In support of this position, counsel cite section 359 of the Civil Code, which provides that "no corporation shall issue stock or bonds except for money paid, labor done, or property actually received." But if that section has any bearing on the case, it seems to us, it must be construed to render void the certificate, and not the condition as to payment, and hence that the note was made without any consideration.

The objection that the condition, to be valid, should have been incorporated in the note, cannot be sustained. The facts of the case in this regard are very similar to those in Billings v. Everett, 52 Cal. 661. There it appeared that defendant gave plaintiff's assignor a note due August 1, 1875, with the oral agreement that the note should not be paid unless a certain water ditch, from which a certain number of acres of defendant's land could be irrigated, should be completed at the time fixed for the payment of the note; and, the ditch not being completed at the time fixed, it was held that there was a failure of consideration for the note, in whole or in part.

Looking at the whole case, we see no valid ground for reversal, and therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

ADAMS v. BURBANK. (No. 19,324.)

RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—QUANTUM MERUIT—SET-OFF.

1. Where one who has contracted with another to build a house wrongfully ousts the contractor, and prevents him from completing the work, the latter may treat the contract as rescinded, and can recover on quantum meruit.

2. In such an action the contract is admissible in evidence as proof of the value of the work, but is not conclusive on that point.

3. Where a contractor for the erection of a building gives to a material man an order on the owner, who owes him enough to pay the same, but refuses to do so, the owner, in an action by the contractor for the work done, cannot set off the cost of a mechanic's lien filed by the material man.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by J. F. Adams against David Burbank for work done and material furnished. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brousseau & Thomas, for appellant. J. L. Murphey, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought by J. F. Adams, the respondent, to recover from appellant the sum of $4,744.64, with interest and costs, for work, labor, and services performed and materials furnished in the construction of a brick building in the city of Los Angeles. It is conceded by the pleadings that on the 1st day of June, 1891, plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement by the terms of which the former was to furnish the material, labor, and work, as specified in certain specifications and shown by the plans, for a brick building to be erected for defendant on Broadway and First streets, in the city of Los Angeles, for which plaintiff was to receive $9.75 per 1,000 as per wall measure of 21 bricks to the foot, etc., to be paid by defendant at the rate of 75 per cent. as the work progressed; the estimates of the superintendent to be taken for the value of the work done, and his certificate to be given therefor; the residue to be paid upon the completion and acceptance of the work, and upon the plaintiff furnishing releases from all material men, or receipts for all material used and for all labor performed to the satisfaction of defendant. The specifications are made a part of the contract, which was filed with the recorder of the county. Plaintiff entered upon the construction of the building, furnished the materials, laid the foundation, built the first story and a small portion of the second story of said building, when, some time in July, 1891, he ceased work upon the same, leaving certain materials, such as brick, mortar, tools, and appliances for the work, and defendant finished the construction, using the material on hand, etc. At the time plaintiff ceased work there was due from him, for materials furnished by sundry parties, as follows: To the Inglewood Brick Company, for brick, $401.50; to H. S. Hudspeth, for sand, $37. Plaintiff, a few days after ceasing work on the building, gave orders for these claims upon the defendant, which he refused to pay; and they thereafter filed liens on the property for the several amounts due them, and prior to the trial of this action suits had been brought to foreclose said liens. Prior to the trial the action to foreclose the Hudspeth lien was dismissed. There was also a further lien filed upon the property to secure the sum of $30.45 due James L. Tucker for hauling brick for the Inglewood Brick Company to the building, but for which plaintiff was not personally liable, said brick company having contracted with him to deliver the brick; and the amount of Tucker's bill was included in the $401.50 due said company, and in the order given them on defendant. The foregoing facts are either admitted, or proven without material conflict.

As to the disputed facts, concerning which there was a substantial conflict in the testimony, it may be said that, in support of the verdict in favor of plaintiff, we are authorized to assume as proven the facts which there is substantial evidence to uphold. Upon this theory it must be said: (1) Plaintiff was proceeding to construct the building of the material and in the manner substantially as provided for in the contract, save as changed by orders of defendant's superintendent. (2) That without cause, and in violation of the contract, defendant took possession of the building, ousted the plaintiff therefrom, and refused to permit him to complete the same in consonance with the contract, and appropriated to his own use the material on hand and provided to be used therein, or in the construction thereof. (3) The labor performed by plaintiff and the material furnished by him, estimated at a fair valuation, are in excess of the verdict found in his favor. (4) Defendant agreed to pay the orders drawn upon him by plaintiff in favor of the brick company and of Hudspeth; and there was at that time in his hands, and due plaintiff, a sum of money greatly in excess of the sum of $438.50 called for by said orders, and that he refused to pay the same, or any part thereof.

The complaint contained three counts: The first, upon the contract; the second, upon a quantum meruit for services and for the materials furnished; and the third, for the value of materials left upon the premises, and converted by the defendant. The court, at the trial, ruled the plaintiff to an election as between the first and second counts, and he elected to go to trial upon the second and third counts. The theory of plaintiff was that defendant having violated the contract, and prevented his completion of the work, he was entitled to treat such contract as rescinded, and to recover, as for work performed and materials furnished at the request of defendant, the reasonable value thereof. This theory is correct; and while the contract was offered in evidence, and was admissible as proof of the value of material furnished and services rendered, it was by no means conclusive on that point, and was to be taken with the other evidence in arriving at such values.

The instructions asked by defendant and refused by the court, numbered from 1 to 12, both inclusive, were properly refused. They one and all involved, in different forms, the theory that plaintiff was bound by the contract price agreed upon for the work, or that the payments therefor were only due and payable in the manner and upon the terms provided by such contract, or that plaintiff could not recover if he had permitted liens to be filed upon the property on account of materials purchased by him, and for which he was liable, and had not paid the same as provided in the contract. Had the contract been adhered to, and the work completed under it, the result sought by these instructions would have followed; but if defendant violated it, and refused to allow plaintiff to consummate the work, he could not hold plaintiff to its terms, and at the same time refuse to perform his own obligations under the same agreement.

The court properly instructed the jury, at the request of defendant, that he, the said defendant, was not personally liable for the debts of the plaintiff, as contractor, to persons furnishing materials to him, and was not under obligation to the plaintiff to pay his debts to the material men, etc.

The court further instructed the jury, in substance, that they should offset the liens to the amount of $438, but not the costs and expenses thereof, provided plaintiff had given orders therefor, and that the defendant was indebted to plaintiff at the time in a sum in excess thereof. This was correct. If the money was due to the plaintiff from defendant, the orders given to the parties who later became lien holders operated as an assignment by plaintiff of his demand, pro tanto, and if defendant refused to pay the orders he should not be permitted to recover from plaintiff the costs and expenses incurred by reason of his refusal.

It is not perceived that Tucker was entitled to a lien. He did not perform labor upon the building, or furnish materials therefor, but was employed by the brick men to haul brick for them, and had no connection with the contractor, who owed him no liability. His position is not different from that of laborers who made the brick. If it, however, be conceded that he was entitled to a lien, as we must presume that, under the instructions of the court, defendant received a credit of $438 on account of the liens, and as the Hudspeth claim for $37 had been dismissed before trial, and defendant was not therefore bound to pay it, he is still a gainer if he pays the Tucker claim of $30.

The instructions given on behalf of plaintiff, taken together, contain a fair exposition of the law applicable to the case. To take up and answer in detail the objections made to them would take much space, and elucidate no principle of importance. The objections to evidence, so far as they involve any doubt as to the propriety of the action of the court, are not of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal, even if well founded. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

SEFTON v. PRENTICE et al. (No. 19,399.)

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—TRESPASS.

1. An agreement to deliver at a certain place a quantity of water, "through and from a pipe, flume, or conduit," does not authorize the person to whom the delivery is to be made to cut at such place a hole in the pipe through which the water flows, and permanently attach thereto a pipe leading to his own premises.

2. It is no excuse for a trespass that no property was injured thereby.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by J. W. Sefton against W. B. Prentice and Julia V. Stewart for an injunction and damages. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

V. E. Shaw and Gibson & Titus, for appellants. E. W. Britt, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action is somewhat difficult to classify. Its purpose is to obtain an injunction to prevent defendants from preventing plaintiff from attaching a water pipe to a certain water pipe of defendants. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The decision of the case rests upon the respective rights of the parties under a certain written contract made by appellants on March 24, 1891, with one Fred. T. Hill. At that time appellants contemplated building some kind of a conduit to carry water from the large ditch of the San Diego Flume Company to Spring Valley, where they owned lands. This contemplated conduit was to run near to and past a point called "Patterson's Corner," which was about 2½ miles distant from the flume of the said San Diego Flume Company. Hill (as trustee) owned a part of lot 9, Ex-Mission rancho, consisting of about 300 acres of land, lying south of and most of it lower in elevation than said Patterson's corner. Appellants at that time had not determined what kind of a conduit they would construct for the purpose of carrying said water. Under these circumstances they and Hill entered into said contract, which provided, generally, that appellants would deliver to Hill, his executors, etc., and "assigns," at said Patterson's corner, for 25 years, such amount of water as Hill would purchase and furnish from the said San Diego Company's flume, not exceeding 10 miner's inches, in consideration of $1,000, which, it is admitted, was paid. Appellants were to begin to deliver the water within six months of the date of the contract. Within that time the said conduit was completed, and, when completed, it consisted of an open flume for about two-thirds of its length, beginning at the flume of the San Diego Company, and the remaining one-third consisted of an iron pipe, about 500 feet thereof next to the flume being 6 inches in diameter, and the rest, to and past said Patterson's corner, being 4 inches in diameter. The point at which the pipe commences is about 170 feet in elevation above said Patterson's corner; and it is continued over a hill to lands of appellants, and by force of the pressure water is carried to appellants' said lands, and also to lands of other persons to whom appellants furnish water. When it was completed, Hill was not prepared to use the water on the land on said lot 9, Ex-Mission rancho, and no request was made for the water mentioned in said contract until the month of April, 1893. At this last-named date the respondent herein, Sefton, was the owner of land lying easterly and about 3,000 feet distant from said Patterson's corner, and about 75 feet higher in elevation; and he also owned two miner's inches of water flowing in the said San Diego Company's flume, with the right to take the same from said flume. He laid an iron pipe from his land to or near Patterson's corner; and claiming that, by certain assignments, he had acquired all of Hill's interest in said contract, he demanded of appellants that they allow him to attach his pipe to theirs, so that by the pressure in appellants' pipe the two inches of water would be carried over the elevation to respondent's said land. This appellants refused to do, but they offered to furnish and turn out to him the two inches of water at Patterson's corner. Respondent then commenced the present action, and by the judgment of the court appellants were enjoined, or rather commanded, to allow respondent to attach his pipe to theirs, and furnish him the said pressure.

We pass over the preliminary points made by appellants; that is, whether the word "assigns" in the contract was not intended in the limited sense of meaning only the successors of Hill in the land in said lot 9; whether the attempted assignment of a certain alleged "receiver" was valid; and whether, under any view, injunction was the proper remedy. Assuming none of these points to be well taken, we are satisfied that, under the contract, neither Hill nor any of his successors or assigns had the right to cut a hole in appellants' pipe, attach another pipe to it hermetically, or use the pressure which it afforded. None of these things were covenanted for in the contract upon which respondent bases his right of action. The contract simply provides that appellants "will deliver to the party of the second part [Hill], his executors," etc., the amount of water before mentioned "near F. E. Patterson's northwest corner, in section 29," etc. The words of the contract upon which respondent mostly relies are these: "Said water to be delivered through and from a pipe, flume, or conduit, to be constructed" by appellants; and great stress is laid upon the word "from" by respondent and the court below. "Every word of the contract," it is argued, "must be given some force and meaning." Of course, in construing a writing, every word which, taken in connection with the other language used, has a distinctive meaning, and in any way qualifies the context, must be considered. But the makers of conveyances and contracts, as well as the makers of laws, are sometimes tautological, and needlessly repeat an idea in different words and phrases. The contract under consideration would be the same if the word "from" were not in it. No water running in appellants' pipe could possibly be delivered at Patterson's corner, in any manner whatever, without being taken from said pipe; otherwise it would inevitably run past said point. The word "from" simply expresses the general idea of separation. Some of its definitions given by Webster are: "Out of the neighborhood of;" "leaving behind;" "out of;" "the antithesis and correlative of to." By the contract, appellants were to construct some kind of a conduit,—any kind that they might choose,—and, through it, to carry and deliver to Hill at Patterson's corner a certain amount of water; but they did not contract to deliver to Hill any part of the conduit itself. "Conduit" is a general word, which applies to any channel or structure by which flowing water can be conducted from one point to another. It includes a ditch, flume, pipe, or any kind of aqueduct. Appellants chose to use a pipe as part of their conduit; but they did not agree to give Hill possession of any part of the pipe, for the purpose of cutting a hole in it and permanently occupying it by his attached pipe, or for any other purpose; and there is not a word in the contract about the furnishing of any "pressure." The contract to deliver the water, no doubt, included such delivery as would give Hill a reasonable opportunity of taking possession of the water delivered; but to sanction the claims of respondent in the premises would be for the court to make a contract for the parties different from that which they made for themselves.

It is contended that the attachment of respondent's pipe to that of appellants would not injure the latter. There is considerable evidence that it would be an injury to appellants; but a man has no right to commit a trespass upon the property of another because, in the opinion of the trespasser or of a court, it would do the owner of the property no harm. Neither is it of any consequence that, after the pipe of appellants had been constructed, they furnished water through connecting pipes to a few persons other than respondent. They had the right, of course, to make such a contract with another person if they chose to do so; but they made no such contract with Hill or his assigns.

The foregoing views are determinative of the appeal adversely to respondent; and, as they cover the merits of the whole case, it is not necessary to notice in detail the various specific points made by appellants. The case was decided in the court below upon the theory that, under the written contract between Hill and the appellants, the latter are compelled to allow the assigns of Hill to permanently attach a pipe to the pipe of appellants; and this, in our opinion, is not a correct construction of said contract. Judgment and order reversed.

SKELLY v. WESTMINSTER SCHOOL DIST. OF ORANGE COUNTY (MORRISON, Intervener). (No. 19,342.)

SCHOOL DISTRICTS—LIABILITY TO GARNISHMENT—VOLUNTARY PAYMENT TO SHERIFF.

1. A school district is not subject to garnishment under Code Civ. Proc. § 542, authorizing the garnishment of any person indebted to a judgment debtor.

2. Though not subject to garnishment, payment by a school district to the sheriff of an amount garnished is a discharge, under Code Civ. Proc. § 716, authorizing any person indebted to a judgment debtor to pay the amount to the sheriff.

3. Payment of the amount due to the sheriff, after issuance of execution, but before delivery to the sheriff, is a discharge, under Code Civ. Proc. § 716, providing that a person indebted to a judgment debtor may pay the debt to the sheriff after issuance of execution, and before its return.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by F. F. Skelly against Westminster school district of Orange county (J. W. Morrison, intervener). There was a judgment for defendant, from which, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff and intervener appeal. Affirmed.

Victor Montgomery, for appellant. F. O. Daniel, for intervener. James G. Scarborough, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to recover $394 alleged to be due for work and materials performed and furnished in the building of a schoolhouse. It is alleged that the claim has been allowed to the extent of $350. The defendant, in its answer, denies that the value of the services and materials exceeded $350, and, as to that sum, pleads payment as follows: That on the 6th day of April, 1892, the Newport Wharf & Lumber Company, a corporation, commenced an action against the plaintiff to recover $545.05, and had summons and a writ of attachment issued on the same day, which said writ of attachment was on that day duly served on the defendant. That thereafter such proceedings were had that on the 11th day of May, 1892, a judgment by default was duly given and made by the clerk of said court in favor of said corporation, against said Skelly, for $549.39 and costs; that on the 6th day of July, 1892, an execution was issued in said action against the property of said Skelly, and July 11, 1892, the sheriff served upon the defendant a copy of the execution, with a notice that by virtue of said writ he levied upon all the moneys, goods, credits, effects, debts due and owing, or any personal property in its possession or under its control, belonging to said defendant therein, and at the same time demanded payment of such debt, or delivery of such personal property. Thereupon, in pursuance of said notice and demand, and before the return of said writ, the defendant paid to said sheriff the amount of said debt due from said defendant to the plaintiff, and took his receipt for the same. The court found for the defendant, and the findings of fact follow closely the language of the answer.

The intervener avers in his complaint of intervention that he is a creditor of this plaintiff, and on the 6th day of April, 1891, commenced an action against this plaintiff to recover the sum of $218.85; that on the same day a summons and writ of attachment were duly issued in said action and served on this plaintiff (defendant in that action). That on the same day the writ of attachment was served on this defendant by delivering to it a copy, with the notice required by the statute; that April 12th judgment was duly entered against said Skelly in favor of the intervener, and April 15, 1892, execution was issued upon the judgment, by virtue of which the constable having the writ levied upon the debt due from defendant to Skelly May 13, 1892; that after the claim of the defendant had been allowed, to the extent of $350, the constable made due demand for the amount of the execution, but defendant refused to pay the same, or any part thereof. The execution was thereafter returned wholly unsatisfied.

The defendant and the intervener, it will be seen, both claim that the admitted debt to the plaintiff has been levied upon under attachment and execution. The plaintiff contends that a school district is not subject to such process. Subdivision 5, § 542, Code Civ. Proc., reads as follows: "(5) Debts and credits and other personal property not capable of manual delivery must be attached by leaving with the person owing such debts, or having in his possession or under his control such credits and other personal property, or with his agent, a copy of the writ and a notice that the debts owing by him to the defendant, or the credits and other personal property in his possession or under his control belonging to the defendant, are attached in pursuance of such writ." The question is whether a school district is a "person," within the meaning of this section. Mayrhofer v. Board of Ed., 89 Cal. 110, 26 Pac. 646, was a case in which it was sought to foreclose a mechanic's lien upon a public schoolhouse. The constitution provides that laborers of every class, and material men, should have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, and the legislature was required to provide by law for the speedy enforcement of the liens. The legislature, by law, provided that such persons should have liens for the labor or material used in the construction of any building or other structure. The language is general, and, in its usual sense, would include a schoolhouse, for that is a building and a structure. But it was held that the statute did not apply to public buildings. The rule is that the state is not bound by general words in a statute which would operate to trench upon its sovereign rights, or injuriously affect its capacity to perform its functions, or establish a right against it. In Savings Bank v. U. S., 19 Wall. 239, it is said: "The most general words that can be devised (for example, any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate) affect not him (the king) in the least, if they tend to restrain or diminish any of his rights or interests. * * * The rule thus settled respecting the British crown is equally applicable to this government, and it has been applied frequently in the different states, and practically in the federal courts." In People v. Herkimer, 15 Am. Dec. 382, some illustrations of the application of the rule are given. The state is not bound by a statute of limitations, unless it is expressly so provided, nor by a statute limiting a time during which a judgment shall be a lien (Com. v. Baldwin, 1 Watts, 54); an act abolishing imprisonment for debt (People v. Rossiter, 4 Cow. 143); insolvent law (U. S. v. Wilson, 8 Wheat. 253), etc. Rules of procedure generally do apply. But this principle does not go to the extent of holding that, where a right of action is given, it authorizes a suit against the state.

The special phase of this question, as applicable to garnishment, is discussed in Divine v. Harvie, 7 T. B. Mon. 439, and in a note to that case (18 Am. Dec. 194) the authorities upon the subject are collected and discussed. That was a creditor's bill founded upon a statute of Kentucky authorizing the court of chancery, upon return of an execution nulla bona, to subject to the satisfaction of the judgment any chose in action, etc., belonging to the judgment debtor. It was said that this act did not include a claim of the debtor against the state. It was pointed out that such a proceeding might cause great detriment to the state, and then the auditor and treasurer were not authorized to determine for the state the right of the attaching creditor to apply the debt to the satisfaction of the judgment. That receives illustration in this case. Plaintiff claims that the officers of the school district have paid the claim of one of his alleged creditors without right, and when there was no valid levy or judgment. The law has not given these officers the authority to determine these questions at the peril of the district. Merwin v. City of Chicago, 45 Ill. 133, was a case in which, an attachment having been sued out against one Nicolson, the city of Chicago was summoned as garnishee. On motion the city was discharged without having answered, and an appeal was taken. The court said: "The question has been often before the American courts, and, although the decisions are not uniform, in a large majority of the cases it has been held the writ would not lie. The reason given for these decisions is uniformly the same, and is substantially that given by this court in the case in 25 Ill. [595, City of Chicago v. Hasley]. It must be decided as a question of public policy. These municipal corporations are in the exercise of governmental powers, to a very large extent. They control pecuniary interests of great magnitude, and vast numbers of human beings who are more dependent on the municipal for the security of life and property than they are on either the state or the federal government. To permit the great public duties of this corporation to be imperfectly performed, in order that individuals may the better collect their private debts, would be to pervert the great objects of its creation. * * * We understand, however, the counsel for the appellant to concede that money due municipal officers, agents, or contractors is not liable to garnishment; but it is insisted, if the city had been required to answer, the alleged indebtedness in the present case would not have fallen in either of these classes. But in our opinion the city should not be subjected to this species of litigation, no matter what may be the character of its indebtedness. If we hold it must answer in all these cases, and the exemption from liability be allowed to depend in each case upon the character of the indebtedness, we still leave it liable to a vast amount of litigation in which it has no interest, and obliged to spend the money of the people and the time of its officials in the management of matters wholly foreign to the object of its creation." The annotator above cited reaches the same conclusion, after citing numerous cases. If such be the rule as to municipal corporations, a fortiori such must be the rule as to school districts. A distinction exists between municipal corporations, which are generally called into existence with the consent of the inhabitants, for local and private advantage, and counties, school districts, and other political divisions, which are created for state purposes. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 23. "The school district or road district is invested by general enactments, operating throughout the state, with a corporate character, the better to perform, within and for the locality, its special function, which is indicated by its name. It is but an instrumentality of the state, and the state incorporates it that it may the more effectually discharge its appointed duty. So with counties. They are involuntary civil or political divisions of the state, created by general laws to aid in the administration of the government." Id. § 25. They are quasi corporations, of the most limited powers known to the laws. The trustees have special powers, and cannot exceed the limits. They are special agents, without general power to represent the district. In this state, for many purposes, the supervisors represent the district; and, in others, the county superintendent. They may be sued, it is true, but this does not enlarge the scope of their powers. On the other hand, some of the powers of a city may be considered private, as they are for the special advantage of the municipality, as distinct from the general public. School districts, being, like counties, political subdivisions of the state, can be sued only by permission of the state. Their funds are all devoted by statute to specific purposes. A garnishment may be regarded as a suit brought in the name of, and on behalf of, one who claims to be a creditor. One question to be determined may be whether the defendant in the process is a creditor. If subject to the writ, the corporation will be required to respond, and submit to a determination of the question. The determination will not bind the alleged creditor.

In accordance with the current of authority, and with principle, I think it must be held that a school district cannot be garnished. But the same reasoning does not tend to show that when the school district has paid the amount of the debt to the sheriff, while the sheriff had in his hands an execution issued upon a valid judgment against the creditor of the district, such payment may not be valid. Section 716, Code Civ. Proc., in no way trenches upon the sovereignty of the state, nor does it impose upon any officer of the state any duties which can embarrass his performance of official duties. The fact that the word "person" occurs in this section, and also in the provisions in regard to garnishment, does not show that unless one applies the other cannot. No doubt the school district is a person, within the Code definition. The decision is not placed upon the ground that the language is not sufficiently broad to include the political divisions of the state, but because laws made primarily to provide for individual rights will not be presumed to include the state when the effect might be to authorize a suit against the state, or embarrass it in the discharge of its functions. Nothing of this kind would result if the officers should voluntarily, acting under section 716, pay the debt. The officers, of course, still take some risks. If no such debt existed against the corporation, or if, for any reason, the execution were invalid, loss might fall upon the officers making the payment. Their only authority in the premises is the section under discussion, and they must be sure that all the necessary conditions exist to justify their action.

It is contended that the demurrer to the second defense should have been sustained. The point is that the judgment upon which the execution was issued is not well pleaded. It is averred that judgment by default was "duly given and made by the clerk of said court." It is not a case in which the pleader was taking advantage of the statutory mode of pleading in lieu of setting out the procedure in detail. There is a sufficient detail of the procedure in the answer, and the averment substantially sets out that default was entered by the clerk, and thereupon judgment entered by him. This the statute authorizes. At all events, as the functions of the clerk are well known, and he is a mere ministerial officer of the court, the inaccuracy could have misled no one.

I do not think the affidavits in regard to newly-discovered testimony entitle appellant to a new trial. It seems that an execution was issued on the 6th, but was retained by the attorney of the Newport Wharf & Lumber Company. The attorney had evidently informed the sheriff of the fact, and he commenced his efforts to find property as though he actually had it in his hands. An order was procured from the school trustees, and a requisition from the school superintendent. Then, before the money was paid, the sheriff took the execution, and received the money from the treasurer. This was a literal compliance with the statute. No doubt both the sheriff and the attorney representing the creditor considered the execution as already delivered to the sheriff. The statute does not require that, however.

If the views herein expressed are correct, it is unnecessary to discuss the case of the intervener. I recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

GOETZ v. GOLDBAUM. (No. 19,331.)

AGENCY—PLEADING—ESTOPPEL TO DENY.

1. A complaint on a contract executed by an agent may, without more, aver its execution by defendant, the principal; and, the agency appearing from the copy of the note set out, authority to execute it is implied, and need not be expressly alleged.

2. Ratification need not be expressly pleaded.

3. W., a merchant, and partner with plaintiff in a livery, failed, and transferred his property to his brother S., through whom he settled with most of his creditors, as he swore, with his own money. Business was done in S.'s name, but W. borrowed money from plaintiff for the business, bought out his interest in the stable, and gave him a note for the whole, signed, "S., per W." Plaintiff asked S. about the note, and S. said he would go and see about it, and went and talked to W., but said nothing to plaintiff. Later he proposed to plaintiff to go into partnership with him and W., putting in the note as capital; and then he took over the business and property from W., paying him some cash, and assuming the debts, among which, at the time, he mentioned this. Held, that he was estopped to say that W. did not sign the note as his agent, and that he had not ratified it.

4. A promissory note, such as, under Civ. Code, § 2309, must be in writing, is a commercial note, not a mere nonnegotiable promise to pay, and the latter may be ratified orally.

Action by J. E. Goetz against Simon Goldbaum on a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Aitken & Smith, for appellant. Daney & Wright, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial. The action is based upon a nonnegotiable promissory note, and in the complaint it is alleged that on the 5th day of October, 1891, defendant executed and delivered a promissory note in writing, in the words and figures following. The note is then set out at length, and is signed, "Simon Goldbaum, per Wm. G." There is no averment showing who Wm. G. was, or that he had authority to execute the note as the agent of defendant. The complaint was demurred to for insufficiency of facts, and as ambiguous, in that it appears that the note was executed by some person other than defendant, but does not show who such person was, or that he had authority to execute the note as agent. The same objection is also made on the ground of uncertainty. It is now contended that the complaint should set out the facts, and not conclusions, and that, if the fact be that the note was made through an agent, it should be so averred. St. John v. Griffith, 1 Abb. Pr., 39, is quoted, in which it is said: "The Code requires facts to be stated, not fiction; the facts of the case, and not the mere legal conclusion. Such a statement as that adopted by the plaintiff is not only admissible, but necessary." In that case it was averred that the act was done by the agent. That decision was by a subordinate court, and is not in accordance with better considered cases. The plaintiff is required to state the facts which constitute his cause of action. The constitutive fact here is plainly that defendant executed the note. Whether by an agent or in person is immaterial. If by an agent, such fact is not one which constitutes his cause of action.

But it is argued, inasmuch as it appears that the note was executed through an agent, the authority should appear. This point is answered by the case of Sherman v. Comstock, 2 McLean, 19, Fed. Cas. No. 12,764. In the declaration in that case it was averred that defendant made his note or check in the words and figures following: "Detroit, December 14, 1838. Cashier of the Michigan State Bank: Pay to Morgan and Clark, or bearer, $674.96 thirty days from date. [Signed] Horace H. Comstock. By Joel Clemens." There was no further allegation as to agency. The declaration was demurred to on the ground that it did not appear that Clemens was authorized to act as agent for defendant. The court said: "As it regards the execution of the note by the defendant, it is sufficiently averred in the declaration. He signed it by Joel Clemens; and that Clemens was authorized to act in the premises appears, for that his act is alleged to be the act of his principal. The declaration might have contained an averment that Clemens was duly authorized to act as the attorney in fact of the defendant, but such averment is unnecessary."

Appellant next complains of the findings. He says that it is nowhere found that defendant executed the note; that, on the other hand, it is found that the note was executed by William Goldbaum, without authority to act as the agent of Simon; and that, in another finding, it is found that William Goldbaum did have implied authority to execute the note as the agent of Simon. In the first finding, it is found that William Goldbaum executed the note which is set out in the finding, pretending to act as the agent of Simon. The use of the word "pretending" is unfortunate, but the context plainly shows that the idea intended to be conveyed is that, in executing the note, William claimed to be acting as the agent of Simon. The court then proceeds to state that William had no express authority; sets out facts from which it draws the conclusion that the act was ratified and adopted by Simon as his act. The court did not find in direct terms that the defendant executed the note, but it found that it was executed by William, claiming to act as the agent of Simon, and that Simon ratified the act; in other words, adopted the instrument as his own. Ratification is in law the equivalent of a previous command. It is proof of due execution. This suggestion is also a sufficient answer to the objection that ratification should be pleaded. It is true the general rule is that estoppel should be pleaded when under the practice there has been an opportunity to plead it; but ratification is not estoppel, although there is often an element of estoppel in it. But the point is also made that the evidence does not justify the finding that there had been a ratification. It appears that prior to October, 1890, William Goldbaum had been carrying on a mercantile business at Oceanside, and had also been engaged in the livery business in partnership with plaintiff. In October, 1890, he failed, and was forced to transfer his property to his brother Simon, the defendant. He made a settlement with most of his creditors, and his brother Simon took a transfer of all the property, including William's interest in the stable, and paid or appeared to pay such debts of William as were then paid. I state the matter in this form because William testified that the money advanced by Simon really belonged to him (William). It was then arranged between William and Simon that William should continue the business in the name of Simon. Goods were to be purchased in the name of Simon, and all transactions were to be in his name. This was necessary, because William had not been able to settle with all of his creditors. The business was carried on in pursuance of this agreement for about one year before the note was given. During that time plaintiff had loaned to William $300 to be used in his business. He then arranged to sell his half of the livery stable to William. The arrangement was made, and the note in question was given, for the $300 which had been previously loaned, and for plaintiff's interest in the stable. Of course, plaintiff knew that the business was being carried on in the name of Simon Goldbaum, and, when he took the note, he asked William if he had authority from Simon to act for him, and was told by William that he had. Plaintiff testified that he knew the business was being conducted by William in the name of Simon, because William told him so. Some two weeks after getting the note, plaintiff went to San Luis Rey to ask Simon Goldbaum about the note. He showed Simon the note, and asked if it was all right. Mr. Goldbaum said: "I don't know what they are doing in town. I will go in this afternoon and see." Plaintiff replied, "Monday will do." Monday, Simon Goldbaum went to the store, and had a private talk with William. Plaintiff was there, but Simon said nothing to him about the note. The testimony of William Goldbaum shows that at that time Simon had a full explanation in regard to the note. Simon Goldbaum said nothing more about the note to plaintiff until November, 1892, when he proposed to plaintiff to go into partnership with himself and William, and said he could put the note in as a part of his capital. In January, 1893, a difference arose between William and Simon Goldbaum. The latter claimed the goods in the possession of William, and which constituted the stock in trade with which William was doing business in the name of Simon Goldbaum. The controversy was settled, Simon Goldbaum taking the business and property, and paying William some $1,700, besides assuming the indebtedness. While negotiations were progressing, a list of debts was produced, which did not contain the debt to plaintiff. Defendant called attention to the fact, and said: "The indebtedness must be more. It is best that we foot up the indebtedness, and make a settlement on that basis." And, again: "There is that Goetz note, too. Don't forget to put that in,—six hundred dollars. * * * I will have to pay that." For various reasons, appellant contends that this does not amount to ratification:

1. Because, he says, William did not, in the purchase of the interest of plaintiff in the livery stable, claim to act as agent, but in his own right. An act not done as agent cannot be ratified. The evidence shows very plainly that the parties to the transaction each understood that William Goldbaum, in making the trade, professed to be acting as the agent of his brother. The note is itself some evidence of that fact; and then plaintiff asked if he had authority to sign the note. Plaintiff knew that William Goldbaum was conducting business in his brother's name, but testified that he knew no more of it than others. Of course, he knew that the interest in the stable which had formerly belonged to William had been conveyed to Simon. The real question is, inasmuch as William really owned the business, although it was conducted in the name of his brother, is not the obligation his, although in the name of his brother? If Jones were to buy out Smith & Co., and were to continue the business on his own account, but in the name of Smith & Co., as to those who knew the facts Smith & Co. would be but an alias of Jones. It does not appear that plaintiff knew that all the property belonged to William, and it does appear that Simon Goldbaum claimed that it belonged to him. The reason why the business stood in the name of Simon was to avoid the creditors of William. It was a hiding of the goods, or they really belonged to Simon, with the understanding that William should somehow get the benefit of the business. Under the circumstances, I think Simon Goldbaum cannot be heard to say that William was not conducting the business as his agent, even as to those who did know the facts.

2. It is contended that the act of William in executing the note could only be ratified by a writing, because it is said a promissory note must be in writing. Civ. Code, § 2309. But waiving the point that the instrument set out in the complaint is conceded not to be a "promissory note," within the meaning of the Code, the contract is not one required by law to be in writing. Only when in writing, it is recognized by commercial law as a promissory note; but the contract is simply an agreement to pay money, which need not be in writing.

3. The facts do not show ratification. I think the facts are quite sufficient, and, furthermore, that, when Simon took the business subject to the payment of the debts, he was under obligation to pay the note. It was not required to be in the memorandum, because Simon Goldbaum recognized his liability on the note, and in effect so said at the time. There is evidence contradicting the testimony to which I have alluded. As the case is presented here, that is of no consequence.

Several objections were made to the introduction of evidence. After examination, I am satisfied that none of them were well taken. A discussion of them would serve no useful purpose. I recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

MERCED SECURITY SAV. BANK v. CASACCIA et al. (No. 18,304.)

MORTGAGES—COLLATERAL SECURITY—SEPARATE ACTIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that there can be but one action for the recovery of a debt secured by mortgage on real estate, does not prevent separate actions on mortgages given as collateral security only of a debt, or of an action on a mortgage given as security for a debt after action on one given as collateral security.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by the Merced Security Savings Bank against A. R. Casaccia and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank H. Farrar, for appellants. T. C. Law, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is upon the judgment roll. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage. The answer is a plea in bar. The court found, among other things, that on the 29th day of July, 1889, one Flanagan was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,032.07, and to defendant Casaccia in the sum of $600. Casaccia then assumed the debt of Flanagan to plaintiff, and gave his note for the same, which was accepted by the bank. Casaccia at the same time took from Flanagan his note, secured by mortgage for $1,632.07, which was then assigned to plaintiff as collateral security for Casaccia's note of $1,032.07. At the same time, Casaccia executed another note to the bank for $400, secured by a mortgage upon land of his own. This was also intended as collateral security for the note for $1,032.07 from Casaccia to the bank, and is the note and mortgage upon which this suit is brought. The condition then was this: The bank held Casaccia's note for $1,032.07; as collateral to secure it, a note and mortgage for $1,632.07, executed by Flanagan to Casaccia, and by him assigned to the bank; and a note of $400, secured by mortgage executed by Casaccia to the bank. In May, 1893, the bank, as assignee of Casaccia, commenced an action to foreclose the Flanagan mortgage, but did not make Casaccia a party to that action. A decree of foreclosure was obtained, and the property sold; and, after paying costs, the sum of $575 was left to be credited upon the debt of Casaccia to the bank, leaving $808.78 still due.

Appellant claims that plaintiff should have brought suit upon the note for $1,032.07 against Casaccia, and in the same action sought to foreclose the mortgage against Flanagan for $1,632.07 and the mortgage involved in this suit for $400, and that, not having done so, he has waived the security on the mortgage sued on in this action, and perhaps the right to sue on the note for $1,032.07. This contention is based solely upon section 726, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt secured by mortgage upon real estate. This statute is a limitation upon the rights which usually pertain to property, and the restriction will not be carried beyond the obvious import of the language used. Accordingly, it has been held that a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure a promissory note does not bar the right, after sale and judgment for a deficiency, to a suit against an indorser of the note to recover such deficiency (Vandewater v. McRae, 27 Cal. 596); also, that after judgment of foreclosure and sale under a mortgage given by a nonresident of the state, upon whom personal service has not been obtained, a personal action may be brought to recover any deficiency remaining after sale of the mortgaged premises, although it was held that in such case the court had no jurisdiction in the foreclosure suit to enter a judgment for such deficiency. Blumberg v. Birch, 99 Cal. 416, 34 Pac. 102. It was said: "It is true that the personal judgment docketed against the defendant was void, and also that, under the section of the Code cited, there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real or personal property. It does not follow, however, that after the mortgage security is exhausted, leaving a deficiency which is no longer secured, no new action on the note can ever be maintained." The Code itself recognizes this view in section 533, where an attachment is authorized when the security has been lost. In these cases, when the personal action was instituted, the debt was not secured by mortgage. If the mortgagee had voluntarily released his mortgage, his debt would then be unsecured. Such a mortgagee, however, would not be entitled to his personal action. It would be an attempt on his part to evade the operation of the statute, while the other cases supposed would not be within the policy of the law, although two actions have been allowed upon a debt which was originally secured by a mortgage. The obvious purpose of the statute is to compel one who has taken a special lien to secure his debt to exhaust his security before having recourse to the general assets of the debtor. When he has done this, or when, without his fault, the security has been lost, the policy of the law does not prohibit a personal action.

The statute was complied with in the suit against Flanagan. The mortgage was not given to secure the principal debt of defendant to plaintiff. It was a collateral matter. The suit to foreclose it was not an action for the recovery of the principal debt. It was an act for the preservation of the security. To do this was a duty imposed upon plaintiff by the contract of hypothecation. That the plaintiff thereby received part payment of the note was an incidental matter. The suit to foreclose was not an action to recover that debt, but to preserve the security. A construction should not be given to a statute, if it can be avoided, which will lead to absurd results or to a conclusion plainly not contemplated by the legislature. In this case there were two mortgages, both taken as collateral security. Suppose the mortgages had been upon land situated in different counties, and that the debt secured by one would be barred by the statute of limitations before the debt secured by the other fell due. Plaintiff could not have included both in one suit to foreclose, because such suits must be brought in the county in which the land or some part of it is situated; and one debt would either not be due when suit was brought, or would be barred by the statute of limitations. Certainly, it was not intended to prohibit the ordinary transaction of putting up collaterals to secure an indebtedness, nor to limit such collaterals to mortgages which can be foreclosed in the same action. The plea in bar, therefore, is not good. There is some greater plausibility in claiming that the mortgage in suit was given to secure the principal debt than that such was the case with the Flanagan mortgage. The present note and mortgage were executed solely as security for the principal debt. There is no other consideration for the note, and it represents no other indebtedness. But, conceding that this mortgage is one given to secure the principal debt, no other action has been brought to recover the debt secured by it, and—if the concession be made—no other could be brought on that note until this security has been exhausted. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

ORR v. KERN COUNTY. (No. 19,382.)

CONSTABLES—FEES.

St. 1893, p. 310, § 7, providing that, in counties of the class to which K. county belongs, constables shall receive "such fees as are now or may hereafter be allowed by law," does not make any change in the existing law relating to fees of constables in that county.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by T. B. Orr against the county of Kern to recover constable's fees. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Patten & Graham and R. J. Ashe, for appellant. J. W. Ahern and A. T. McCreery, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The superior court drew the correct conclusion of law from the facts found, and the judgment must therefore be affirmed. Section 7 of the act of March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 310), amending the act of March 31, 1891, establishing a uniform system of county governments, provides that, in counties of the class to which the county of Kern belongs, constables shall receive "such fees as are now or may hereafter be allowed by law." It is too plain to admit of argument that by this language the legislature meant to say that constables should, until otherwise enacted, continue to receive the same fees in the county of Kern as they were then allowed by law. In other words, it was not the intention of the amendatory act of March 23, 1893, to make any change whatever in the existing law relating to the fees of constables in that county. Judgment affirmed.

JONES v. SANDERS. (No. 15,306.)

NEW TRIAL—DEATH OF TRIAL JUDGE—AUTHORITY OF SUCCESSOR—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Where, after findings and judgment, a trial judge dies, his successor may review the findings and grant a new trial.

2. An order granting a new trial for insufficiency of evidence will not be reversed on appeal unless the trial court clearly abused its discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by M. P. Jones against C. T. Sanders. There was a judgment for defendant, and, from an order granting a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, for appellant. W. S. Goodfellow, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and the question involved was whether the plaintiff had a right to maintain a certain sewer across a lot owned by the defendant in that city. The case was tried before the late Judge Hoge, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the ground that the findings were not justified by the evidence, but, before the motion was heard, Judge Hoge died. Afterwards the motion was heard by another judge of the court, and granted, and from that order this appeal is prosecuted by the defendant.

It is claimed for appellant that, as Judge Hoge presided at the trial, his findings upon all the questions of fact should be treated as conclusive. We do not understand this to be the rule applicable to a case like this. It is true that this court will not review findings when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, but it has been repeatedly held that, upon motion for a new trial, it is the duty of the trial court to examine the evidence, even though it be conflicting, and, if dissatisfied with the conclusions reached, to grant a new trial; and the rule is the same whether the motion is heard by the judge who tried the case, or by some other judge, whose only knowledge of the facts is obtained from the record. Macy v. Davila, 48 Cal. 646; Bauder v. Tyrrel, 59 Cal. 99; Blum v. Sunol, 63 Cal. 341; Wilson v. Railroad Co., 94 Cal. 166, 29 Pac. 861.

It is also claimed that the evidence without any substantial conflict was sufficient to justify and sustain the findings made by Judge Hoge, and that the order granting the new trial was therefore erroneous. But it is well settled that a motion for a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and that an order granting a new trial on that ground will not be reversed on appeal unless it appears that there was a clear abuse of discretion. Pico v. Cohn, 67 Cal. 258, 7 Pac. 680; Breckinridge v. Crocker, 68 Cal. 403, 9 Pac. 426; Nally v. McDonald, 77 Cal. 284, 19 Pac. 418; Bjorman v. Redwood Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 Pac. 591. Here we do not think any such abuse of discretion appears as would justify a reversal of the order. This being so, no good would be accomplished by a rehearsal of the facts; and any discussion of them for the purpose of indicating the results which should be reached on the new trial would be obiter dictum, and out of place. The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. SANDERS v. JONES. (No. 15,388.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1894.)

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by the people, etc., on the relation of C. T. Sanders, against M. P. Jones. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, for appellant. W. S. Goodfellow, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The questions arising on the appeal in this case are substantially the same as those considered in Jones v. Sanders (No. 15,306, just decided) 37 Pac. 649. The action was brought to compel the removal of obstructions from an alleged public street, commonly known as "Touchard Street," in the city of San Francisco. The trial was before Judge Hoge, and the findings and judgment were against the defendant. A motion for new trial was made upon the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision and of errors of law occurring at the trial, and, after the death of Judge Hoge, was heard and granted by another judge of the court. The appeal is by the people, from the order granting the defendant's motion. In support of the appeal the same points are made as in Jones v. Sanders, and what was said in deciding that case is applicable here. Upon the authority of the decision in that case, we think the order appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MARQUIS v. CITY OF SANTA ANA. (No. 19,380.)

MUNICIPAL OFFICES—ABOLISHMENT — CHANGE OF SALARY—REMEDY OF OFFICER.

1. An officer may sue a city for salary, even though he may be entitled to relief by writ of mandate.

2. Under the municipal government act (St. 1883, p. 251, § 755), providing that the assessor shall receive a compensation, to be fixed by ordinance, which shall not be increased or diminished during term of office, it cannot be changed during term of office by an ordinance accepting the provision of an act previously passed that the assessment by the county might be made the basis of municipal taxation, the act stipulating, however, that its provisions should not be in effect in any city till accepted by ordinance.

3. Right of an officer to salary is not affected by diminution or cessation of the duties of the office, the office itself remaining.

4. A city office created by the legislature cannot be abolished by the city.

5. The office of city assessor, created by the municipal government act (St. 1883, p. 251, § 752), is not abolished by the act of March 2, 1891, providing that the assessment by the county may be made the basis of municipal taxation, provided that it shall not be in force in any city till it, by ordinance, elects to avail itself thereof by a certain day "of each year."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by W. H. Marquis against the city of Santa Ana for salary as assessor. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

West & Heathman, for appellant. Jas. G. Scarborough, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff was elected to the office of city assessor of the defendant on the 13th of April, 1891, and entered upon the duties of his office April 20, 1891. Previous to his election, viz. March 16, 1891, the salary of that office had been fixed by an ordinance of the city at $375 per year, payable one-half thereof on the first Monday of July, and one-half thereof on the first Monday of September. March 2, 1891, the legislature passed an act (St. 1891, p. 22) providing that in cities in this state, excepting municipal corporations of the first, second, third, and fourth classes, and cities operating under a freeholders' charter, the assessment of property made by the county assessor might be made the basis of municipal taxation. The act, however, contained the following proviso: "Provided, however, that the provisions of this act shall not apply to or be in force in any city or municipal corporation until its board of trustees, common council, or other legislative body, shall have passed an ordinance electing to avail itself of the provisions of this act, and filed a certified copy of the same with the auditor of the county in which such municipal corporation or city is situated on or before the first Monday in March of each year." The defendant is a municipal corporation of the fifth class, and on February 15, 1892, through its board of trustees passed an ordinance electing to avail itself of the provisions of the above act, and by the same ordinance repealed its former ordinance fixing the compensation of the city assessor. A copy of this ordinance was filed with the county auditor of Orange county, in which the city of Santa Ana is situated, on February 23, 1892. March 21, 1892, the defendant passed an ordinance repealing a prior ordinance providing for a street poll tax; so that all of the duties imposed upon the assessor by virtue of any city ordinance were taken away. After the passage of these ordinances, the plaintiff performed no duty as city assessor, except to make out the list of male persons over the age of 21 years residing within the limits of the city, required by section 787 of the municipal government act. The defendant refused to allow or pay to the plaintiff any salary for the second year of his incumbency of the office, and he thereupon brought this action. Judgment was rendered in his favor, and the defendant has appealed directly upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions.

1. The objection that the court had no jurisdiction in the matter, for the reason that the writ of mandate was the proper remedy, was properly disregarded. Even though it should be conceded that the plaintiff might have sought relief through a writ of mandate, he was also entitled to bring an action for the amount claimed by him.

2. Section 755 of the municipal government act (St. 1883, p. 251) provides: "The clerk, treasurer, assessor, marshal, city attorney and recorder shall severally receive at stated times a compensation to be fixed by ordinance by the board of trustees, which compensation shall not be increased or diminished after their election, or during their several terms of office." The power of the legislature to abolish the office of city treasurer, or to change the compensation of the officer, or its power to authorize the city to change his compensation during his term of office, is not presented in the present case, as the legislature has neither abolished the office, nor changed the compensation, nor given to the city the authority to make such change. As the power of the defendant to fix or change the salary of its officers rests entirely upon statute, the exercise of this power is subject to all the limitations contained in the statute. The plaintiff was elected to the office of city assessor after the adoption of the ordinance fixing the amount of his salary, and the limitation in the above section that his compensation shall not be increased or diminished during his term of office renders the act of the defendant repealing the ordinance fixing his salary nugatory. As the defendant could not directly, by express ordinance for that purpose, diminish the amount of his salary, the same result could not be accomplished by it indirectly, either by accepting the provisions of the act of March 2, 1891, or by doing away with the necessity for his services through its adoption of the ordinance abolishing the street poll tax. The right of an officer to the salary fixed by law for that office is not impaired by any change that may be made in the duties of the office, or even by an entire cessation of those duties, so long as the office itself remains in existence.

3. It is urged by the appellant that its election to avail itself of the provisions of the act of March 2, 1891, had the effect to abolish the office of city assessor. As the office is, however, created by the legislature, it could not be directly abolished by the city; much less could its abolition be implied from any act that did not in terms purport to abolish it. The office is provided for in section 752 of the municipal government act, which has never been repealed; and the act of March 2, 1891, instead of sustaining the suggestion of an implied repeal of that section, expressly declares that its provisions shall not be given force in any city until it shall have passed an ordinance electing to avail itself thereof, on or before the first Monday in March of each year, thus implying that the office continues to exist. The duties of the city assessor are fixed by section 787 of the municipal government act; and while it may be conceded that the election by the defendant to avail itself of the provisions of the act of March 2, 1891, did away with the necessity for the performance by the assessor of any acts connected with the assessment of property, theretofore imposed upon him, so long as such election remained in force, it does not follow that the office of assessor was thereby abolished. Section 787 prescribes as one of the duties of this office that "the assessor shall during said term also make a list of all male persons residing within the limits of such city over the age of twenty-one years, and shall verify said list by his oath, and shall on or before the first Monday of August in each year deposit the same with the city clerk." It is urged by the defendant that, inasmuch as the only apparent object for which this list is to be made is to form the basis for collecting an annual street poll tax, the repeal of the ordinance providing for the street poll tax relieved the plaintiff from the duty of preparing this list. The statute, however, under which he holds his office, makes the preparation of this list one of his official duties; and we are not at liberty to assume that the only object of this requirement was to enable the city to collect a street poll tax, or that he would be justified in omitting this official duty prescribed by the statute, even though the city, by its ordinance, rendered his act in preparing it of no avail to it. The city had still the power to pass an ordinance imposing this tax, and might then avail itself of the list thus prepared; but, whether the duties have been increased or diminished, or entirely dispensed with, so long as the office remains, the salary affixed thereto is an incident of the office, and must be paid to the incumbent. We have, however, seen that the office has not been abolished; and the defendant does not contend that, if the office is still in existence, the respondent is not its incumbent. It follows that he is entitled to the salary attached to the office at the time of his election, and that the action of the court in holding this defense to be unavailing was correct. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

HORTON v. JACK et al. (No. 19,328.)

EXECUTORS — CONVEYANCE FOR INDIVIDUAL DEBT —CONVERSION—LIMITATIONS.

1. An action for conversion is within Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 3, prescribing the limitation of an action for taking, detaining, or injuring goods or chattels.

2. One to whom an executrix conveys property of the estate, in payment of her individual debt, before distribution, and without authority of the probate court, is, on refusal to return, liable to the estate for conversion, though the executrix was the sole legatee, and the property was the community property, and executrix was testator's widow.

3. In order to maintain such action, it is not necessary to prove an indebtedness against the estate, and necessity of obtaining the property to satisfy it.

4. Though the person to whom an executrix conveys property belonging to the estate does, as he agrees, have it applied on the claim of a bank against her individually, the bank is not jointly liable with him to the estate for the conversion of the property, it not being shown that he was acting for the bank in such manner as to bind it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by Joseph Horton, administrator with the will annexed of James A. Brown, deceased, against R. E. Jack and the First National Bank of San Luis Obispo. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed as to defendant Jack.

M. C. Hester and Graves & Graves, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin and J. M. Wilcoxon, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial. The complaint shows that James A. Brown died testate October 26, 1889, in the county of Santa Barbara, leaving his widow, Catherine J. Brown, his executrix; that said will was duly admitted to probate, the said Catherine J. appointed executrix, and that she duly qualified as such, and took possession of the property of the estate, consisting in part of certain personal property, which is specifically described in the complaint; that on the 15th day of April, 1890, while the said executrix was lawfully possessed of said property, as the property of the estate, defendants "wrongfully and without right took and carried away said personal property, and the whole thereof, and converted and disposed of the same to their own use." Said property was at the time of the value of $6,000. Catherine J. Brown died April 17, 1892, not having closed the administration. Proper allegations follow, showing due appointment and qualification of plaintiff as administrator with the will annexed. The complaint was demurred to for insufficiency of facts, and because it appeared from the complaint that the cause of action was barred by section 339, Code Civ. Proc. The demurrer was overruled, and defendants answered separately. The answer of the bank consists of denials. The answer of defendant Jack denies the conversion, the alleged value of the property, the official character of plaintiff; avers that Catherine J. Brown was paid the full value of the property, and that the cause of action is barred by section 339, Code Civ. Proc. The answer then proceeds with an averment that James A. Brown, by his will, bequeathed all his property to Catherine

J. Brown, and appointed her executrix, with power to sell personal property without leave of court; that she qualified, and afterwards procured an order authorizing her to sell the personal property, including the property described in the complaint, at private sale; that she did, subsequently to the order, execute to Jack a bill of sale of the property, but did not deliver the same to him, but afterwards agreed with Jack that the property should be delivered to one Sandercock, to be by him sold, the proceeds, less expenses, to be paid to Jack for the bank, and to be applied to an indebtedness of said Catherine J. to it; that thereupon said Catherine J. appointed said Sandercock her agent, and delivered the property to him; that Sandercock sold the property as her agent, and, at her request, paid the money to the bank. The answer then proceeds with a plea in bar of plaintiff's claim.

Respondent raises a preliminary point, to the effect that plaintiff is entitled to no relief, because his complaint shows that his cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, and the demurrer on this ground should have been sustained. If the demurrer were well taken, it would not follow that respondent could avail himself of the point on this appeal; but, waiving that, the point is not well taken. The question suggested is whether an action for the conversion of goods is barred by subdivision 3 of section 338, Code Civ. Proc. Respondent claims that such an action is not covered by that section, and is therefore included in section 339, and is barred in two years. The complaint shows that the suit was not commenced within two years after the alleged conversion. Subdivision 3, § 338, reads: "An action for taking, detaining, or injuring any goods or chattels, including actions for the recovery of specific personal property." Cooley defines "conversion" as follows: "Any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exerted over one's property, in denial of his right or inconsistent with it, is conversion." The author also quotes with approval from Liptrot v. Holmes, 1 Kelly, 381: "The action of trover being founded on a conjunct right of property and possession, any act of the defendant which negatives or is inconsistent with such right amounts in law to a conversion. It is not necessary to a conversion that there should be a manual taking of the thing in question by the defendant. It is not necessary that it should be shown that he has applied it to his own use. Does he exercise a dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of the plaintiff's right? If he does, that is, in law, a conversion." While there may be cases, under this definition of "conversion," where there is no manual taking or corporal detention of the property, still I apprehend there is no case in which the plaintiff has not been actually deprived of his property, or is not entitled under the rules of law to consider himself deprived of it for the sake of the remedy, and when a judgment for damages for the conversion has been paid the wrongdoer becomes the owner of the property. It has been wrongfully taken from the owner, although it is not necessary that the original taking be wrongful. The words in the statute are not used to indicate any particular form of action, but I think it applies to all those cases in which the person injured has a remedy in an action of claim and delivery, or for conversion. Certainly, one whose property has been wrongfully taken or detained may sue for conversion, if at the time he was entitled to the possession of it. I think the case falls within the provisions of section 338, and the cause of action was not barred.

The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found for the defendant Jack, a nonsuit having been entered as to the bank. Several findings of fact are excepted to as not sustained by the evidence. Among such findings are the following: (1) That the personal property was never delivered to Jack, although it is admitted that a bill of sale of the property was made and delivered to him; (2) that Sandercock, who took the property and sold it, was the agent of the executrix, and not the agent of Jack; and (3) that the proceeds of the property were paid to the executrix.

1. It seems that Mrs. Brown was indebted to the bank, of which Jack was president; that it was agreed between Jack and Mrs. Brown that the property should be conveyed to Jack as security, and immediately sold, and the proceeds paid on Mrs. Brown's personal indebtedness to the bank. In pursuance of this agreement an absolute bill of sale was executed, and Sandercock was selected to sell the property, with the consent of Mrs. Brown. Having delivered the bill of sale to Jack, and agreed upon Sandercock as a proper person to conduct the sale, Mrs. Brown prepared a letter to be handed by Sandercock to Bailey, her agent, and which was so delivered. It was as follows: "Mr. S. P. Bailey—Dear Sir: I have made a bill of sale to Mr. Jack of the whole outfit. Mr. Sandercock, the bearer of the note, will consult you about the disposition of the outfit. If Mr. Sandercock cannot manage the disposition of the same without your help, then you will please go with him. Mr. Sandercock acts as Mr. Jack's agent and the entire disposition must be under Mr. Sandercock's control. C. J. Brown." Mr. Sandercock, also, at the same time, handed Bailey a letter from Mr. Jack, as follows: "Mr. Bailey—Dear Sir: This will introduce to you my friend, Mr. John G. Sandercock. I have bought of Mrs. J. A. Brown the whole grading outfit which belonged to the late J. A. Brown, and I send him down to represent me in the premises, and to sell according to the general plan that you have arranged. You will therefore please deliver the whole business to my representative, Mr. Sandercock. I should be pleased to have you accompany Mr. Sandercock, and assist him all in your power. Mrs. Brown's desire also is that you shall accompany Mr. S., and aid with your counsel and co-operation. Yours, truly, R. E. Jack." Bailey, acting for Mrs. Brown, had already arranged to ship the goods to Modesto for sale. They were then turned over to Sandercock, who shipped them to Modesto. Bailey accompanied him, but acted in entire subordination to Sandercock. The property was sold, and the proceeds sent by Sandercock to Jack, who applied them to the payment of Mrs. Brown's individual debt to the bank. At the trial Mr. Jack testified as follows: "The understanding, as between Mrs. Brown and Mr. Unangst and myself, was that he would put this property into my hands to be sold for her, and the amount applied on this bank indebtedness. We were then making advances after the property was sold, and the money paid into my hands. I placed it to the account of Mrs. Brown in the First National Bank, i. e. account to her during her lifetime for the moneys so received. I always accounted for them. They were applied to her account at her request." On cross-examination he testified: "Q. Did you ever have any account with Mrs. Brown as executrix of the estate of J. A. Brown? A. I told you yesterday I hadn't. * * * Q. Did you ever file a claim with her in a formal way, and have her approve it as administratrix or executrix of the estate? A. No. * * * Q. She never borrowed any money from your bank, did she? A. Yes; borrowed a great deal. Q. What was the amount of it? A. I don't know what amount it was. Q. Did she borrow herself? did she get the money? A. Yes." Mr. J. A. Brown had been engaged in certain work at Port Harford. After his death, Mrs. Brown continued the work on her own account, at a loss. A small part of the indebtedness was that of Mr. Brown, which was never presented to the estate for allowance. Most of it was incurred by Mrs. Brown herself. From these extracts, I think it is evident that the findings, in the respects mentioned, are not sustained by the evidence. In the nature of things, there could not well be a substantial conflict upon these points.

The court also found that Jack had not converted the property to his own use. That he took the property, by the consent of Mrs. Brown, to sell, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of her individual debt to the bank, cannot be denied. Did it amount, under the circumstances, to a conversion? Of course, when Mrs. Brown conveyed the property to Jack in payment of her individual debt, she misappropriated it. She put it out of her power to hold the property as executrix for the estate, and subject to the orders of the court. It was a clear violation of her duty. It was a wasting of the estate which would constitute a devastavit. Ordinarily, no doubt, one who receives property under such circumstances in payment of an individual debt of the executrix to him may be treated by the successor of such executrix, after a demand and a refusal to deliver the property, as a wrongdoer. Respondent contends that such consequence cannot follow here, because the executrix was also sole legatee, and therefore had the power to sell and apply the property to her own use. The will does not in terms authorize the executrix to sell property without leave of the court. Nor, if it be conceded that all the property is by the will bequeathed to the widow, would that consequence follow. As legatee she could sell her interest subject to the administration. In the will the testator declared all his property community property. He then gave one dollar each to two brothers and three sisters. He then declares that he has executed deeds to his wife for his real estate, and deposited them in escrow, to be delivered to his wife upon his death. He then bequeaths his personal property to his wife, but directs that his wife "shall, by will or otherwise, cause any and all residue or remainder of my real estate and personal property remaining after her death to be distributed [to his brothers and sisters], but I wish her, my said wife, to be untrammeled in the use of said estate during the term of her natural life." Subsequently to the sale to Jack and by him, and the application of the proceeds, Mrs. Brown died. The sale to Jack was never confirmed by the probate court. There had, however, been made an order of sale which authorized the executrix to sell the personal property at private sale. No report was ever made to the probate court of any sales made through Sandercock, but the executrix reported to the court that she had, through mistake, sold the property in question to Jack to pay her individual debt. Thereupon, the probate court refused to confirm the sale. It does not appear whether or not there are debts outstanding against the estate, or whether the administrator with the will annexed has in his hands money or property with which to pay the expenses of administration. Nor does it appear when notice to creditors was published, or, indeed, whether such notice has been published at all. The construction of the will is a matter for the probate court, but I will assume that the will gave the property to Mrs. Brown absolutely, except that she was denied the power of testamentary disposition. One-half she did not take under the will, but it all was subject to the right of the personal representative to have the custody during administration, and to the payment of the debts of the testator and the costs of administration. The executor undoubtedly has such title and right of possession as will authorize him to maintain an action for the conversion of the assets of the estate. Nor do I see how title derived from an heir or legatee can constitute a defense, or put the executor to the necessity of proving an indebtedness to satisfy which the property is necessary. The vendee in such case may have rights which should be protected when the estate is finally distributed to the beneficiaries under the will. Pending the administration, however, the legatees have not the right of possession, and may be held for conversion if they wrongfully deprive the executor of the property. A contrary rule might lead to great trouble and loss. It may not be known whether there are creditors or not until nearly 10 months have elapsed. Yet the administrator is responsible to creditors for the preservation of the property. If the vendee of an heir had made way with property, and had become insolvent, the administrator could not defend himself on the ground that he had delivered the property to an heir; and, besides, it cannot always be known who are heirs or legatees until distribution. Power to declare the succession, to determine heirship, and to construe wills, is in the probate court. Courts in which suits of this character may be brought cannot determine such questions; and, if such defense may be made, it would lead to delay and expense. The policy of the law certainly is that estates should be quickly settled, and administrators should not be exposed to such litigation. Until distribution, the right of the representative should be absolute, in the interest of all concerned. A fair illustration of the possible evils of such a rule would be in the well-known Blythe estate. Suppose a "claimant" in that estate had property, and would not deliver it because there were sufficient assets without it? Would any court where such suit was brought against the claimant be compelled to determine the question of heirship? The right of a legatee differs a little from that of an heir. But there is no difference under the statute as to the right of a legatee to possession prior to distribution. Nor do I see that the fact that the property was community property can make a difference. The widow does not take her share of the common property as heir, but her title is subject to administration and payment of debts. Her title is no more absolute than that of an heir at law, and the administrator has the same right of possession. Respondent has not been able to cite an authority which will sustain the conclusion reached by the court. He cites, however, Hunt v. Hunt, 11 Nev. 442; Presby v. Powers, 81 Ill. 125; and Rutherford v. Thompson, 14 Or. 236, 12 Pac. 382. In Hunt v. Hunt, it was held that the widow was the devisee of the property, and that her deed conveyed title subject to administration, and that the title of the purchaser was good,—not as against the executor, but as against an heir at law. Presby v. Powers is a mis-citation. I have found no such case.[1] In Rutherford v. Thompson no such question was involved. A person, not the legal representative, and not an heir or legatee, had disposed of some of the property, and the question was how far the common-law doctrine applicable to executors de son tort obtained in Oregon. It is enough, however, in my opinion, to say that the legislature has given to the personal representative the custody of the property, and has made him responsible for it, and has also provided the mode in which he may be discharged of his responsibility. The power of the legislature over the subject is plenary, and the law recognizes no such exception as it is sought to establish in this case. As we have seen, the will contains no grant to the executrix of power to sell. The fact that the property was bequeathed to the same person who was named as executrix is not the equivalent of such power, nor does it make a case which comes within the decision in Re Delaney, 49 Cal. 85. I think, therefore, the court erred in holding that Jack did not convert the property to his own use.

The cause of action was not barred by the judgment rendered in the suit of R. E. Jack v. Catherine J. Brown. Mrs. Brown was not sued in her representative character, nor was any question raised in the case as to the right of Mrs. Brown to dispose of the property to Jack. The validity of the sale was not questioned. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage given by Mrs. Brown upon real estate. No mention of this property was made in the complaint. In the answer it is averred that a portion of the debt was paid by the sale to him by Mrs. Brown of certain personal property. It is not shown in any way that it is the property involved in this action, but, conceding that it was, it is not claimed that it belonged to the estate. Having bought it as the property of Mrs. Brown, and sold it, and applied the proceeds to the payment of his debt, Jack could not then have refused to give her credit for it. Both parties, then, repudiated the title of the estate.

There was no error in granting the nonsuit as to the bank. Quite possibly, plaintiff could have shown that Jack was acting for the bank in such manner as to bind the bank, and render it jointly liable. I do not find such testimony in the record. I think the judgment of nonsuit in favor of the corporate defendant should be affirmed, but that the judgment and order in favor of defendant Jack should be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment of nonsuit in favor of the corporate defendant is affirmed, and the judgment and order in favor of defendant Jack are reversed.

DOW v. NASON et al. (No. 19,329.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The issue being whether a note was paid, a finding that it was paid will not be disturbed because the evidence leaves the matter somewhat in doubt.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by H. G. Dow against Arthur G. Nason and others on a promissory note. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Trippet, Boone & Neale, for appellant. Cassius Carter and A. C. Younkin, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The pleadings, findings, and briefs herein do not present the facts of this case with remarkable clearness. It appears, however, that the $5,000 note made by Arthur G. Nason to H. W. Nason, which is the subject of this action, was pledged as security for the payment of certain other promissory notes, and the pivotal point in the case is whether or not these last notes were paid. The court found that they were not paid, and, while the evidence on the point leaves the matter somewhat in doubt, we do not think it so weak as to warrant us in saying that it does not support the finding; and, this being so, there is no ground for disturbing the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

ACTION TO FORFEIT GRANT—BREACH OF CONDITIONS—COMPLAINT—APPEAL.

1. Though a general demurrer to a complaint was overruled by consent, defendant may, on appeal from a default judgment after answer, question its sufficiency.

2. A complaint for forfeiture of a right of way granted on condition of the construction of the road on the line designated, continuous operation of the road when constructed, establishment of stations at points to be designated by plaintiff, and maintenance of the road in good condition, which alleges that the stations were not established, that the road on its completion was not operated continuously or at all, and that it has long since ceased to be operated, and has not been kept in good condition, but has been allowed to become wholly out of repair, and that there has been a total failure to comply with the conditions, sufficiently states, as against a general demurrer, the completion of the road and breaches of the conditions.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by John P. Jones and others against the Los Angeles & Pacific Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by plaintiffs to declare forfeited a certain right of way granted by them to the Los Angeles County Railroad Company, the predecessor in interest of the defendant, upon the ground that certain conditions subsequent attached to the grant had not been complied with. Defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled by consent, and an answer filed. The defendant did not appear at the trial, and plaintiffs had judgment, from which defendant appeals. The only question presented is as to the sufficiency of the complaint. The demurrer being general, the fact that it was overruled by consent is immaterial. One of the conditions of the grant of the easement was the erection and construction of the road on the line designated, and the operation of the road when constructed. The second condition was that the company should establish two stations on the line granted, the particular points of each of said stations to be selected by the parties of the first part (the plaintiffs herein). It is further provided in the agreement that, upon the completion of the road, it should be operated continuously and without interruption; and again, if the corporation should "at any time hereafter cease to operate said railroad, or fail or refuse to keep the same in good order and condition, * * * then the grant hereby made and all rights thereunder shall cease and determine." The complaint alleges breaches of the foregoing conditions, to the effect that said stations were not established nor the station houses built at the places mentioned, or at any place selected by the plaintiffs herein, or at any place at all; and as to the other conditions it is alleged "that neither the defendant nor the Los Angeles County Railroad Company, upon the completion of said railroad, operated the same continuously or without interruption, so as to accommodate the transportation of freight and passengers between the city of Los Angeles and the town of Santa Monica; but, on the contrary, said railroad has not been operated at all, * * * and has never left or received passengers or freight in the usual manner of first-class railroad lines, or at all, at any such stations, and that the defendant has long ceased to operate said railroad, and has failed and refused to keep the same in good order and condition, but has allowed the same to become completely out of repair, and has altogether failed to comply with any of the conditions of said agreement." The complaint is not well drawn, but, in the absence of a special demurrer, we think it sufficient to state a cause of action. Taking its allegations together, it may be fairly construed as alleging the completion of the road; and, assuming that fact to be sufficiently stated, its remaining allegations are entirely sufficient in charging breaches of various conditions of the agreement heretofore quoted. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

GUTIERREZ v. HEBBARD, Judge. (No. 15,694.)

APPEAL BOND—FIXING AMOUNT—DUTY OF JUDGE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 945, providing for a stay of proceedings under a judgment directing the delivery of possession of lands, upon the execution of a proper undertaking on appeal, in an amount fixed by the judge, the judge must fix such amount, though the judgment has already been executed.

In bank.

Application by Gutierrez for writ of mandate to compel J. C. B. Hebbard, judge, to fix the amount of an undertaking on appeal. Application granted.

T. J. Crowley, for petitioner. E. J. Pringle, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Application for a writ of mandate. In the action of Emeric v. Alvarado, for the partition of the Rancho San Pablo, the above-named petitioner was one of the defendants claiming a portion of the land, and by the final decree was awarded one portion of the land claimed by her; another portion, designated as "Lot No. 198," being allotted to H. F. Emeric. This decree was entered March 3, 1894, and notice thereof served upon the petitioner upon the same day. By the terms of the decree, it was ordered and adjudged "that the several parties to this action do forthwith surrender and deliver up the possession of such parcels of said rancho as they now respectively occupy, which have not been allotted to them in severalty by said decree, and that, in default thereof, writs of possession shall, on the application of any of the parties thereto, be issued by the clerk of said court, and under the seal thereof, directed to the sheriff of the county of Contra Costa, commanding him to place said parties in the quiet and peaceable possession of the said parcels allotted to them as aforesaid, and to remove all other persons therefrom." At the date of the decree, and for several years prior thereto, lot 198 was in the possession of W. B. Hellings and his tenants, claiming to hold the same under and as the successor in interest of Mrs. Gutierrez. After the entry of the decree an appeal therefrom was taken to this court on behalf of, and in the name of, Mrs. Gutierrez; and an application was made to the respondent to fix the amount of the undertaking against waste, and for use and occupation, required by section 945, Code Civ. Proc., for the purpose of staying proceedings on the judgment. This application was heard by the respondent March 23d, after notice thereof had been given to Emeric, and was by him denied. Thereupon, the present application was made to this court for a writ of mandate directing the respondent to fix the amount of such undertaking. In his answer to the application the respondent alleges that on the 5th day of March an affidavit was filed in the superior court showing that, after entry of the decree, demand had been made by Emeric upon Hellings and his tenants for the possession of lot 198, and that they had refused to give possession; that upon an ex parte application on said affidavit a writ of possession was issued by the clerk, under the order of the court, directed to the sheriff, to place Emeric in the quiet and peaceable possession of lot 198, and to remove all other persons therefrom; that before any application had been made to fix the amount of the undertaking the said writ had been served and executed by the sheriff, and return thereafter made, to the effect that he had placed said Emeric in actual possession of the premises, and removed all other persons therefrom. It is now claimed on behalf of the respondent that because of these facts he was not required to fix any amount for said undertaking.

We are of the opinion, however, that it was the duty of the respondent to fix an amount for which the appellant might give an undertaking to stay proceedings upon the judgment, if she so desired. Section 945, Code Civ. Proc., provides that all proceedings in the court below upon a judgment which directs the delivery of possession of real property may be stayed if the appellant executes a written undertaking to the effect that during the possession of such property by him he will not commit, or suffer to be committed, any waste thereon, and that if the judgment be affirmed he will pay the value of the use and occupation of the property from the time of the appeal until the delivery of the possession thereof. This is a right conferred upon an appellant by the statute, and the same statute makes it the official duty of the judge to fix the amount of the undertaking that is to be given. If the judge refuse to fix the amount for such undertaking, he thereby deprives an appellant of a substantial right which the statute has conferred. The decree in the present case directs the delivery of possession of real property, and was rendered by the respondent; and when he was informed of the desire of the petitioner to appeal therefrom, and to have proceedings thereon stayed pending the appeal, his official duty to fix the amount of the undertaking was clear. If, after the entry of the decree, matters had supervened which might deprive the appellant of an effective stay of proceedings, even though she should give the undertaking, the respondent should determine the sufficiency of those matters when presented upon a direct issue in which her right to the stay of proceedings was involved, rather than adjudicate upon their sufficiency before there was an opportunity for her to ask for such stay. Whether, after she had given such an undertaking, she could avail herself of the privileges which the statute confers, would be a matter then to be considered and determined. If, in fact, the execution of the decree had become so complete that there were no proceedings thereon to be stayed, no harm could be done to any of the parties to the action by the giving of such an undertaking; and if there should be any reason by which the appellant might show herself entitled to a stay, notwithstanding the execution of the decree, she ought to be allowed that privilege. The respondent should not deprive her of the opportunity which the statute affords in this respect, by refusing to fix the amount of the undertaking. The application for the writ is granted.

EACHUS et al. v. LOS ANGELES CONSOLIDATED ELECTRIC RY. CO.

(No. 19,205.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1894.)

CHANGE OF STREET GRADE — INJURIES TO ABUTTING PROPERTY—LIABILITY OF CITY — MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Under Const. 1879, art. 1, § 14, which provides that private property shall not be taken or "damaged" for public use without compensation, the owner of a lot on a street which was dedicated to the city may recover for damages thereto caused by the grading of the street to the established grade. Beatty, C. J., and McFarland, J., dissenting.

2. In an action by a lot owner for damage to his lot caused by grading the street, evidence of the diminution in the value of the lot by the adoption of the ordinance establishing such grade is inadmissible, as there can be a recovery only for the actual physical change of grade.

3. Benefits to the lot from the operation of a street railway on the street after it was graded cannot be considered to diminish the damages.

4. Where the only objection to evidence was that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial," it cannot be argued on appeal that such evidence should have been excluded on account of the manner in which the question was asked.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by B. D. Eachus and another against the Los Angeles Consolidated Electric Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Pope, for appellant. Galbreth & Morrison, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs are the owners of a lot of land in the city of Los Angeles, situate at the corner of First and Figueroa streets, having a frontage of 142 feet on First street and 50 feet on Figueroa street. The lot is a portion of a larger tract of land which originally belonged to the municipality, and was laid out by it into blocks and streets in 1872. The plaintiffs became the owners of their lot in 1887, and built a house thereon in which they lived for several years. In 1891 the defendant received a franchise from the city of Los Angeles to construct a railroad along First street in said city in front of the plaintiffs' property, and, in preparing the street for the construction of its railroad, made an excavation in the middle of the street to its official grade. The street is 82½ feet in width, and, for the purpose of laying its tracks upon the official grade of the street, the excavation made by the defendant in front of the plaintiff's property was 28 feet in depth at the corner, gradually diminishing to a depth of 20 feet at its rear and extended to within ten feet of the boundary line of their lot fronting on the street. The ordinance conferring the franchise upon the defendant is not set forth in the record, and it does not appear whether there was any requirement that the track should be laid upon the official grade of the street; and, although it was admitted that until the excavation made by the defendant the street had never been changed from its natural grade, it does not appear from the record when the official grade was established. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover the damages caused to their lot by reason of the acts of the defendant in cutting off their access thereto. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in their favor for $823. The defendant has appealed.

The constitution of 1879 (article 1, § 14) provides that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to or paid into court for the owner." Prior to the adoption of this constitution, it was held that an abutting owner was not entitled to compensation for any injury to his property resulting from a lawful change in the grade of the street fronting thereon; but in Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 6 Pac. 317, it was held that this provision of the constitution gave to him a remedy that he did not previously have, and authorized a recovery for such indirect or consequential damage to his property as he might sustain over and above that sustained by him in common with other abutters, or the public in general. This provision does not exist in the constitution of many of the states, and it is only within a few years that it has been incorporated into the constitution of any state. Hence, the opinions of courts in other states, which were rendered at a time when no such rule of law existed, are inapplicable, and apt to be misleading in their reasoning. The constitution does not, however, authorize a remedy for every diminution in the value of property that is caused by a public improvement. The damage for which compensation is to be made is a damage to the property itself, and does not include a mere infringement of the owner's personal pleasure or enjoyment. Merely rendering private property less desirable for certain purposes, or even causing personal annoyance or discomfort in its use, will not constitute the damage contemplated by the constitution; but the property itself must suffer some diminution in substance, or be rendered intrinsically less valuable, by reason of the public use. The erection of a county jail or a county hospital may impair the comfort or pleasure of the residents in that vicinity, and to that extent render the property less desirable, and even less salable; but this is not an injury to the property itself, so much as an influence affecting its use for certain purposes. But whenever the enjoyment by the plaintiff of some right in reference to his property is interfered with, and thereby the property itself is made intrinsically less valuable, he has suffered a damage for which he is entitled to compensation.

The right of the owner of a city lot to the use of the street adjacent thereto is property which cannot be taken from him for public use without compensation; and any act by which this right is impaired is, to that extent, a damage to his property. When a city subdivides a tract of land, of which it is the owner, into blocks and streets, and sells the same, it thereby dedicates the streets to public use, and the purchaser of one of those lots acquires an easement in the street fronting upon his lot, for the purposes of ingress and egress, which attaches to the lot, and in which he has a right of property as fully as in the lot itself; and any subsequent act of the municipality by which that easement is destroyed or substantially impaired, for the benefit of the public, is a damage to the lot itself, within the meaning of the constitutional provision, for which he is entitled to compensation. Such easement is a right of property incident to the lot itself, and any damage sustained by the owner, in its destruction or impairment, is a damage peculiar to himself, and independent of any damage sustained by the public generally. For the purpose of determining this damage, it is immaterial whether he has the fee in the street, or only an easement for its use. In either case it is property, for an injury to which he is entitled to relief. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 Pac. 6; Rude v. City of St. Louis, 93 Mo. 413, 6 S. W. 257; Hobson v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. St. 595, 24 Atl. 1048; Schaufele v. Doyle, 86 Cal. 107, 24 Pac. 834. Rigney v. City of Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, is a leading case on this subject. In that case the fee of the streets was in the city; and the city had constructed a bridge or viaduct on a public street intersecting the street on which the plaintiff's lot fronted, and about 220 feet distant from his lot, thus interfering with his access to that street, except by means of a flight of stairs, and his premises were thereby damaged and depreciated in value. The court held that the injury sustained by him in the prevention and impairment of free access to his lot was a damage for which the constitution gave him a right of recovery, and that, in order to recover for the damage which private property had sustained for public use, "it is sufficient if there is a direct physical obstruction or injury to the right of user or enjoyment, by which the owner sustains some special pecuniary damage in excess of that sustained by the public generally, which by the common law would, in the absence of any constitutional or statutory provisions, give a right of action." The supreme court of the United States gave the same construction to that provision in the constitution of Illinois in Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 8 Sup. Ct. 820. Similar principles have been enunciated in other states whose constitution contains this provision. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 Pac. 6; Sheehy v. Railway Co., 94 Mo. 574, 7 S. W. 579; Hatch v. Railroad Co., 6 Wash. 1, 32 Pac. 1063; City of Atlanta v. Green, 67 Ga. 386; Lowe v. City of Omaha, 33 Neb. 587, 50 N. W. 760; Johnson v. Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 402; Railroad Co. v. Williamson, 45 Ark. 429; Railroad Co. v. Eddins, 60 Tex. 656; Railway Co. v. Fuller, 63 Tex. 467.

Whether the grading of the street in front of a lot will increase or diminish the value of the lot will depend upon the relative condition of the street and lot before and after the grading, and must be determined from the circumstances of each case. The elements which enter into this consideration are varied, and no rule can be prescribed which will be applicable to all cases. It is not every change of grade that will constitute a damage to the adjacent property. An excavation of one or two feet might not appreciably impair the value of the lot, while one of twenty feet would naturally have that effect; and the increased facility for communication with other parts of the city, or the opening up of the land to access by the public, may fully equal if not exceed the cost of grading the lot to correspond with the changed grade of the street. The mere fact that the property is worth as much after the grading as before is not an absolute test, since this may be the result of a general advance in values throughout the entire vicinity, irrespective of the grading, or dependent upon some municipal improvement of which the grading in front of the lot is only a part. Railway Co. v. McCloskey, 110 Pa. St. 442, 1 Atl. 555. Nor is its diminution in value for some particular use necessarily a damage to the property. The grading of a street may impair the desirability or salability of a lot for use as a residence, while at the same time it may render it so desirable as a site for a warehouse or a manufactory as to increase its market value. The market value of a lot is not determined by its value for any particular use, but results from a consideration of all the uses for which it is adapted and to which it may be applied. Town Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. 977. And it is only when the market value of property is diminished by the public use that the property can be said to have sustained such damage as will entitle its owner to receive compensation.

The same rule is applicable when a street is for the first time reduced to an established grade as when a change in the grade has been made after the street has once been brought to such grade. The suggestion that, when the owner dedicates his land for a street, it is with the understanding and consent on his part, binding also upon his grantees, that it will be subsequently fitted for use by grading, applies with as much force to any subsequent change in the established grade as to the first establishment of a grade. The power of the city to determine the grade is not exhausted with its first exercise, and the dedication by the owner must be deemed to have been made with a knowledge of this principle as much as with a consent to the establishment of any grade. The purchaser of a city lot fronting upon a street takes it subject to a right in the public to make the street available for the enjoyment of the easement therein for which the street was originally dedicated; but we are not aware that it has ever been held, where the foregoing constitutional provision prevailed, that the public had a right to establish any grade it might choose, irrespective of the damage such owner might sustain. This right to establish a grade in the street is attended with the corresponding obligation imposed by the constitution to make compensation for any damage to the private property which may be caused by the public in its exercise of the right. It may be conceded that the dedication of a street carries with it the right to make such a reasonable grade as will adapt it for use, for in such a case the grading of the street would have the effect to increase rather than to diminish the value of the lots adjacent thereto by making them accessible to the public; but, if the municipality deems it desirable to establish such a grade as will cause a damage rather than a benefit to the lots, the owner is entitled to compensation for the amount of this damage. The establishment of the grade is for the benefit of the public rather than of the adjacent owner, and if, in establishing such grade, the owner suffers damage, his property has been damaged "for public use." In City of Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535, the street fronting the plaintiff's property was graded for the first time to a line about six feet below the ground on which his house stood, and the court held that the city was liable for any damage sustained thereby, saying: "It is urged that a municipal corporation is not liable for damages growing out of grading their streets. That was no doubt true before the adoption of our present constitution. Article 2, § 13, declares that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. Now, this was private property, and the improvement was being made for public use; and, if the property was damaged thereby, appellee is entitled to just compensation for such damage. If injury was sustained, it was for public use." And in City of Bloomington v. Pollock, 141 Ill. 351, 31 N. E. 146; the same court said: "We are unable to see any sound legal ground for a distinction between cases where the damage is done under an ordinance which changes the grade of a street, and cases where the damage is done under an ordinance which for the first time establishes the grade." See, also, Borough of New Brighton v. United Presbyterian Church, 96 Pa. St. 331; Hendricks' Appeal, 103 Pa. St. 358; Jones v. Borough of Bangor, 144 Pa. St. 638, 23 Atl. 252.

The damage sustained by the plaintiffs was caused by the actual grading of the street, and not by the ordinance fixing the grade. Jones v. Borough of Bangor, 144 Pa. St. 638, 23 Atl. 252; O'Brien v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. St. 589, 24 Atl. 1047. Until the physical condition of the street was changed, their lot had received no actual damage for public use. The enactment of the ordinance rendered it possible that the street would at some time be reduced to that grade, but a mere paper change of grade did not affect the condition of the lot, or impair its use or enjoyment. Any diminution in value that it might sustain from the mere passing of the ordinance was purely speculative, and contingent upon the time when grading should be done, and would no more constitute the damage contemplated by the constitution than would a diminution in its value resulting from excessive taxation, or the contraction of a municipal debt. Hence, the court did not err in refusing to permit testimony as to the damage caused by the adoption of the ordinance. Nor was the benefit that might be derived from the construction or operation of the defendant's railroad material to the issue. The use to which the street might be put by the defendant after the excavation had been made did not affect the damage caused to the lot by the excavation.

The plaintiffs were entitled to recover in this action the entire damage which their lot had sustained by the act of the defendant in making the excavation in the street. Railroad Co. v. Scott, 132 Ill. 429, 24 N. E. 78; City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 Pac. 6. The action was not for any personal damage that the plaintiffs had sustained prior to the action by reason of the interruption that they had sustained in their access to the lot, nor for damages resulting from an unlawful or unauthorized use of the street by the defendant, but it was for the damages which had been done to the lot itself by the permanent change in the street. These damages do not depend upon any subsequent use of the lot, but were complete when the grade was changed, and could be recovered in this action.

For the purpose of ascertaining the amount of damage that the plaintiffs had sustained, witnesses were asked, "What effect did the cut have upon the value of the property?" And, upon replying that its effect was to depreciate the value, they were then asked, "To what extent?" and in reply stated the amount. These questions were objected to by the defendant upon the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; and it is now urged that the opinions of the witnesses should have been limited to the market value of the property before and after the grading was done, and that the jury should have drawn its conclusion of the amount of damage from such evidence, rather than from the opinions of the witnesses. If this special objection had been made at the trial, the plaintiffs could have asked the questions in such a way as to obviate the objection; but it is well settled that, unless the evidence is inadmissible for any purpose, a party is not at liberty, under this general objection, afterwards to urge a special objection which goes merely to the form in which the evidence is sought. Crocker v. Carpenter, 98 Cal. 418, 33 Pac. 271. The extent to which the property was damaged by the grading was the precise issue in controversy, and evidence tending to establish the amount of that damage was neither incompetent nor irrelevant nor immaterial. The inquiry of the witnesses respecting the value of the property would of itself, in the absence of any qualifying term, imply the "market value;" and it was open for the defendant, upon cross-examination, to show that their opinion referred to some associate value. The subsequent question respecting the "extent" to which its value had been depreciated was but another mode of inquiring what was its market value after the grading; and the defendant had the same opportunity of testing by cross-examination the weight and accuracy of the replies to this question, or to show by other testimony that the value of the property had been increased by the grading, or that its depreciation was attributable to other causes than the grading. The judgment and order are affirmed.

I dissent: McFARLAND, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. When the tract of land embracing these lots was by the owners laid off into streets and squares, the plat recorded, and the lots sold by reference to such recorded plat, the streets were thereby dedicated to the public; and this dedication carried with it an implied consent, binding upon the owner and its successors, that the streets might be properly graded to fit them for the purpose for which they were dedicated. Such consent was a waiver of any claim for damages to abutting lots by reason of a proper grade. Here the city has established a grade which, so far as appears, is, with reference to the whole tract, entirely reasonable and proper, although it is an injury to these particular lots; and the defendant, in laying its track, has been required to conform to the grade so established. The owners, in my opinion, have no claim for damages for bringing the street to the established grade. Corcoran v.

City of Benicia, 96 Cal. 1, 30 Pac. 798, seems to me to be in direct conflict with the decision here.

PEOPLE v. BRYON. (No. 21,108.)

COMPOUNDING FELONY — SUFFICIENCY OF INDICTMENT — DEFECTIVE PLEADING—AIDER BY VERDICT.

1. An information stating that the crime of grand larceny was committed by one H., and that defendant, knowing of the commission of said crime by said H., did receive from said H. $20 upon the agreement that the said defendant would compound and conceal the crime, sufficiently charges an offense under Pen. Code, § 153, which provides for the punishment of "every person who, having knowledge of the actual commission of a crime, takes money or property of another" upon any agreement to compound or conceal such crime.

2. Pen. Code, § 1004, provides that, if an indictment or information does not substantially conform to statute made and provided therefor, the defect is a ground for demurrer. Penal Code, § 1012, provides that the objections mentioned in section 1004, if apparent on the face of the information, can be taken advantage of by demurrer only, except objections to the jurisdiction, and that the indictment does not charge a public offense.

3. Pen. Code, § 1185, provides that a motion in arrest of judgment may be founded on any defects mentioned in section 1004, unless the objection has been "waived by a failure to demur." Held, that an objection "that the information does not substantially conform to the law in such case made and provided" is waived if not taken by demurrer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; J. K. Law, Judge.

William Bryon was convicted of compounding a felony. Order granting an arrest of judgment reversed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People. C. H. Marks and B. F. Fowler, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The respondent was charged by information with the crime of compounding a felony, and convicted. At the time set for pronouncing judgment he moved for an order in arrest of judgment, upon the grounds: "That the information in this action did not and does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense,—that is, the facts stated do not constitute a public offense;" and "that said information does not substantially conform to the law in such cases made and provided." The court granted the motion, and the people appeal from the order.

No brief has been filed on behalf of respondent, and we are left to solve the questions presented without any assistance from him. Section 153 of the Penal Code provides: "Every person who, having knowledge of the actual commission of a crime, takes money or property of another * * * upon any agreement or understanding to compound or conceal such crime * * * is punishable," etc. The information charges that on or about the 11th day of December, 1893, in the county of Merced, "one Maurice Hardy did commit the crime of grand larceny, a felony,—that is to say, that at said time and place the said Maurice Hardy did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously steal and take from the person of E. O. Mickle the sum of forty dollars, lawful money of the United States, said money being the property of and belonging to the said E. O. Mickle; that said William Bryon, at said time and place, and prior to the filing of this information, having knowledge of the commission of said crime by said Maurice Hardy, as aforesaid, did take and receive from the said Maurice Hardy the sum of twenty dollars, lawful money of the United States, upon the agreement and understanding, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously made and entered into with the said Maurice Hardy, that he, the said William Bryon, would compound and conceal the crime which had been committed as aforesaid by said Hardy, contrary," etc.

The Penal Code contains the following provisions in regard to indictments and informations:

"Sec. 950. The indictment or information must contain * * * 2. A statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended."

"Sec. 959. The indictment or information is sufficient, if it can be understood therefrom * * * 6. That the act or omission charged as an offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. 7. That the act or omission charged as the offense is stated with such a degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon a conviction, according to the rights of the case.

"Sec. 960. No indictment or information is insufficient, nor can the trial, judgment, or other proceeding thereon be affected by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits."

No demurrer to the information was interposed, and all objections thereto mentioned in section 1004, except that the facts stated did not constitute a public offense, were waived. Pen. Code, §§ 1012, 1185. The only question, then, is, did the information state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense? The facts necessary to constitute an offense under section 153 of the Penal Code are: Knowledge of the actual commission of a crime, and the taking of money or property of another upon an agreement or understanding to compound or conceal such crime. The information charges that the crime of grand larceny was committed by Hardy, and states when, where, and how it was committed. It then charges that the respondent, "having knowledge of the commission of said crime," took money from Hardy upon the agreement and understanding that he would compound and conceal the same. It is true the information does not say, "having knowledge of the actual commission of said crime;" but, if the crime was committed, it was actually committed, and, if respondent had knowledge of its commission, he had knowledge of its actual commission. The omission of the word "actual" was therefore immaterial. In our opinion the information was sufficient to meet all the requirements of the Code, and there was no valid ground for an order arresting the judgment. We advise that the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

QUACKENBUSH v. REED et al. (No. 15,302.)[1]

DECLARATION OF HOMESTEAD — SUFFICIENCY—RECORDING—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

1. Under the homestead act of 1860 (section 1), which requires that the declaration of claim of homestead shall be acknowledged and recorded as conveyances affecting land, and provides that from "the filing for record of such declaration" the husband and wife shall be deemed to hold the homestead as joint tenants, the omission by the clerk to copy into the record the acknowledgment of the wife in such a declaration does not affect the validity of the homestead.

2. Homestead laws should be liberally construed in favor of the exemption.

3. The description of the land in a declaration of homestead by reference to a recorded deed is sufficient.

4. Under the homestead act of 1860 (section 1), providing that the selection of a homestead may be made by the husband and wife, or either of them, or other head of a family, declaring "their" intention in writing to claim the same as a homestead, a declaration by a wife need only declare it is "her" intention.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Action by Thomas M. Quackenbush against John J. Reed, administrator, and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd, for appellant. Lindley & Eickhoff and Hepburn Wilkins, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage dated December 8, 1887, executed by Hugh Boyle, now deceased. Defendant Carmelita Natividad Boyle is the widow of Hugh Boyle, and was the wife of the decedent at the time of the execution of the mortgage, April 29, 1872. She, being then the wife of Hugh Boyle, made a declaration of homestead, which was in due form and properly acknowledged and duly filed for record in the recorder's office of Marin county, where the property is situated, in which the mortgaged premises were claimed as a homestead. The mortgage was executed by the husband alone, and defendants now claim that it is void. Plaintiff contends that the premises were not impressed with the character of a homestead, because (1) the declaration, though duly filed for record, was not recorded; (2) it does not particularly describe the premises; (3) the declaration does not state that it was the intention of both husband and wife to claim the premises as a homestead, but only that it was the intention of the declarant (the wife) to claim such exemption. Appellant also claims (1) that he was a purchaser for value without notice; (2) that the court erred in not permitting him to amend his complaint, and avers that when the declaration was filed the premises were of the value of $30,000; also in not permitting him to show the present value of the premises that he might recover the excess. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The declaration was filed under the homestead law of 1860 (Hitt. Laws, § 3541 et seq.). The declaration was copied by the recorder into the proper book, but he omitted from the acknowledgment the words, "and who is personally known to me to be the person whose name is subscribed to the said annexed instrument as a party thereto." Section 1 of the act of 1860 reads as follows: "The homestead, consisting of a quantity of land, together with the dwelling-house thereon and its appurtenances, not exceeding in value the sum of five thousand dollars, to be selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, or other head of a family, shall not be subject to forced sale in execution or any final process from any court, for any debt or liability contracted or incurred after the passage of the act to which this is amendatory. Said selection shall be made by either the husband or wife, or both of them, or other head of a family, declaring their intention in writing, to claim the same as a homestead. Said declaration shall state that they or either of them are married, or if not married, that he or she is the head of a family; that they or either of them, as the case may be, are at the time of making such declaration residing with their family or with the person under their care and maintenance on the premises, particularly describing said premises, and that it is their intention to use and claim the same as a homestead; which declaration shall be signed by the party making the same, and acknowledged and recorded as conveyances affecting real estate are required to be acknowledged and recorded, and from and after the filing for record of such declaration the husband and wife shall be deemed to hold said homestead as joint tenants; and all homesteads heretofore appropriated and acquired by husband and wife under the act to which this act is amendatory shall be deemed to be held by such husband and wife in joint tenancy." The declaration and the acknowledgment being in all respects perfect, does this omission render the claim of homestead void? Appellant contends that, as the section above quoted provides that the declaration shall be recorded as conveyances are required to be recorded, and as such conveyances, as the law stood before the Code, must have been copied into the record, with the proper certificate of acknowledgment, in order to impart notice, it must follow that the same rule applies to homesteads, under the act of 1860. There was, then, no such provision of law as section 1170, Civ. Code, to the effect that an instrument shall be deemed to be recorded when duly filed for record. Appellant claims that the record, when made, is retroactive, and then makes the record notice from the time of filing. I find some difficulty in understanding a retroacting notice. Those who purchase intermediate the filing and the record are purchasers with notice, if the instrument be correctly copied into the proper book; but they will be purchasers without notice if the recorder inadvertently or corruptly omits a word from the acknowledgment. This opens a wide field for fraud, and seems to me unreasonable. Of course, as the constructive notice is a creature of statute, the legislature could make it what they please. But absurd or unfortunate results should be avoided if possible. But I do not find any provision making the record of a declaration of a homestead notice to any one. Certainly the language quoted, requiring that it shall be recorded as conveyances are required to be recorded, is entirely insufficient for that purpose. It is not included in section 24 of the act of 1850 (Hitt. Laws, § 649), nor in sections 25 and 26 of the same act. Nor was it necessary. The question as to homestead under that act was always domicilium vel non. Has the law authorizing the homestead been complied with, or not? If the law has been followed, the premises constitute a homestead; if not, not. True, the legislature has wisely provided for a record, but the provision with reference to it is important only as one thing to be done as a condition precedent to the creation of the homestead. What, then, does the statute require to be done in order to create the homestead? It will not be denied that defendant Boyle did all that was incumbent upon her to do when she filed for record a proper declaration, properly acknowledged. But the legislature had the power to declare that the homestead character shall not attach until and unless the officer has performed his duty, and correctly copied the declaration into the proper book. Has it so provided? I think not. Appellant contends that the rule of construction applicable to cases where parties are deprived of their rights by legal proceedings, as in suits to condemn land, shall prevail. But this court has decided otherwise; that the law is remedial, and is to be liberally construed in favor of the exemption. Schuyler v. Broughton, 76 Cal. 524, 18 Pac. 436; Southwick v. Davis, 78 Cal 508, 21 Pac. 121. The statute says that the declaration shall be acknowledged and recorded as conveyances of real estate are required to be acknowledged and recorded, "and from and after the filing for record of said declaration, the husband and wife shall be deemed to hold said homestead as joint tenants." There could hardly be a plainer declaration that the premises constitute a homestead from the time of filing.

[1] Rehearing denied.

2. The premises are described in the declaration by reference to a map made by H. Austin, civil engineer and surveyor, as a part of the Reed Rancho, and as particularly described in a deed, which is referred to, giving the names of the parties to it, the date and the page of the record in the recorder's office of the same county in which the declaration of homestead was filed. It is not contended that the record referred to does not give a full and ample description, but it is contended that the premises cannot be described by such reference in a declaration of homestead. If the record referred to does not particularly describe the premises, the point might be well taken. As it is, even with the aid of the earnest and able argument of counsel, I fail to see why the case is not completely covered by the case of Ornbaum v. His Creditors, 61 Cal. 455.

3. A mere reading of the statute above set out is a sufficient answer to the objection that the declarant did not state that it was the joint intention of both herself and husband to claim the premises as a homestead. The statute explicitly and carefully provides that either husband or wife may make and file the declaration. This right cannot be taken from either by the refusal of the other to join in the claim. This policy, so plainly manifested, is not defeated by the use of the plural pronoun "their." The context plainly shows that it was not meant to require a joint intention.

The claim that plaintiff is an incumbrancer in good faith need not be further discussed.

If plaintiff could have shown that the homestead claim was void because the premises were at the time of the declaration worth more than $5,000, he required no amendment to his complaint for that purpose. So, too, if the homestead did not include the entire premises, because the homestead right only extended to land worth $5,000, that could have been shown without further averment. But the position is not sound. The homestead was the land or premises described (Sanders

v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 Pac. 852), and every attempt to convey or mortgage it is unavailing. I see no real difference, so far as this point is concerned, between the statute of 1860 and the present homestead law. In each the homestead consists of the premises described in the declaration. I think the judgment and order must be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PERRY v. ROSS. (No. 18,312.)

HOMESTEAD—CONTRACT FOR PURCHASE — ASSIGNMENT—LIEN.

Where a married man, who was in possession of railroad land, and who had filed a declaration of homestead thereon, makes a contract of purchase with the railroad company and assigns the contract to one who advances part of the purchase money, the assignee has no lien on the land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Clara B. Perry against W. G. Ross. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John C. Deuel, for appellant. George A. Nourse, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action to quiet title. Plaintiff avers: That she is the widow of Jesse L. Perry, deceased. That decedent died January, 1891, leaving him surviving plaintiff, his widow, and eight children. That letters of administration were duly issued to plaintiff, who qualified and administered the estate. Said Perry, in his lifetime, to wit, June 23, 1890, purchased from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company the tract of land in controversy, and said company, for a valuable consideration paid to it, agreed to make to said Perry, his heirs or assigns, when the deferred payments should be made, a good and sufficient deed for the land. That the land was purchased with community funds. That said Perry was then residing upon the land with his family, and on the 11th day of December made and filed for record his declaration of homestead in due form. That thereafter, in the estate of said Perry, the same was duly set apart to plaintiff for a homestead. That the court did also find that the total value of said estate was less than $1,500, and thereupon set over to plaintiff all of the estate of said Perry for the support of herself and her minor children. That defendant claims title to the property, but without right. Defendant answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and for a separate defense averred that Jesse L. Perry, on the 9th day of December, 1890, being indebted to defendant, made, executed, and delivered to him his promissory note for $211.21, with interest, and, in case suit was instituted to collect the same, for attorney's fees; that the said sum of $211.21 was part of the purchase money paid by said Perry for the said land, and that at the time of its execution said Perry assigned, transferred, and delivered to defendant all his interest in said land and the contract of purchase, to have and to hold as security for the payment of the note; that no part of principal or interest of said note has been paid. The case was tried without a jury, and the court found that the probate proceedings were in accordance with the allegations of the complaint. The purchase was not made with community funds, but at the time of the purchase said Perry was married, and was residing on the premises with his family, and had filed a declaration of homestead thereon. The court in the probate proceedings did set over to plaintiff all the right, title, and interest, claim, and demand to said homestead which said Jesse L. Perry had at the time of his death, and had acquired by said purchase; and also found that the whole value of the estate of said Jesse L. Perry did not exceed $1,500. But the plaintiff did not by any decree become entitled to the premises in suit, or acquire any muniment of title thereto or to said contract of purchase. That Jesse L. Perry executed the note described in the answer in consideration of a loan to said Perry of $211.21, which was a part of the purchase money paid for said land and contract of purchase; and that at that time said Perry assigned said contract to defendant as security for said note. Defendant is still the owner of the note, no part of which has been paid. Plaintiff, in her motion for a new trial, attacks several of these findings, as not justified by the evidence; among them: (1) That the purchase was not made with community funds; (2) that the money due on the note was a part of the purchase money; and (3) that the contract was assigned.

The first is entirely immaterial. If the money was community property, the husband had the control and management of it. The point aimed at was not whether the money was or was not community property, but whether it was money advanced by defendant for the purchase of the land. Even though it had been so advanced, it was still community property in the hands of Perry.

But the second is also of no consequence. If one having a homestead borrows money to buy an outstanding title or claim of title against it, the lender does not thereby acquire a lien on the homestead. Nor can I see how there can be a resulting trust. No trust results in favor of one who lends money to another with which to buy land.

The real question in the case is raised under the third point. There was no conflict in the evidence. It is a question as to the effect of the evidence. Does the statement in the note, "This note is secured by R. R. contract 10,353 for deed, given to Jesse L. Perry," together with the fact that the contract was then delivered by Perry to Ross, create a lien upon the land, or convey to Ross the contract right? Perry entered into the contract after he had filed his declaration of homestead. That which is covered by the exemption is the land, and not any particular claim of title to it. Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 Pac. 852; Quackenbush v. Reed (No. 15,302) 37 Pac. 755; Alexander v. Jackson, 92 Cal. 514, 28 Pac. 593. When Perry entered into that contract he added to his claim of title by mere possession his right under the contract, which—if the vendor was the legal owner of the land—was an equitable title. He could not convey this equitable title apart from the land, and he could not convey that except as provided in the homestead law. The assignment of the contract would amount to nothing, unless it carried the equitable title. It could not do that under the circumstances. It is true, ordinarily, one having a contract for the purchase of land may transfer his rights by merely assigning the contract. But here is a statutory inhibition. It cannot be doubted but that Perry, after he had become the purchaser with the right of possession, could have acquired a homestead right in the premises. If he had done so, he could not convey the land, except in the statutory mode. He could not evade the statute, and convey the land by assigning the contract of purchase. I cannot see that it makes any difference that he filed his declaration before he made the purchase. Even then he had some evidence of title. Having possession, he was owner as to all the world except the holder of the legal title, and he was entitled to the benefit of the homestead act. I have assumed, for the purpose of this opinion, that the words quoted from the note, with the delivery of the contract, would amount to an assignment of the contract, if the land had not been a homestead. I doubt if this would constitute an assignment, but, under the view I have taken, it is not necessary to determine that. I think the judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

MARTIN v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF YOLO COUNTY. (No. 18,288.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNTY HIGH SCHOOL — ACTION BY SUPERVISORS—ACQUIREMENT OF LAND.

Under Acts 1891, p. 58, § 3, requiring the board of supervisors, after the people have elected to establish a county high school, "to estimate the cost of purchasing a lot, erecting a building, and furnishing the same, together with the cost of conducting the same for the next 12 months," etc., and section 5, requiring the board to convey the building, when completed, to the board of education, who are to hold it in trust for the people, mandamus will not be granted to compel the supervisors to estimate the cost of erecting a building, etc., where the only step towards purchasing a lot has been the acceptance of an offer of a person to vouch that another shall convey to them a certain lot, as title to the lot must first be acquired.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Application for writ of mandamus by J. T. Martin against the board of supervisors of Yolo county. From a judgment granting the writ, defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. M. Mead, Dist. Atty., and Armstrong, Bruner & Platnauer, for appellant. R. L. Simpson, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court in a proceeding of mandamus, requiring the appellant to estimate the cost of erecting a county high-school building, of furnishing the same, and of conducting the school for 12 months. Waiving all other questions arising out of the somewhat complicated legislation on the subject of high schools, we do not think that the acts which the judgment compels appellant to perform are acts which the law specially enjoins, because no lot of land had been acquired upon which to erect the building. The promise of Ross and Bush to vouch that the city of Woodland would furnish a lot for such school purposes provided the appellant would erect thereon a first-class high school, the "property to revert to the owners when it ceases to be used for high-school purposes," is entirely too vague to be considered as furnishing any sort of title to the lot mentioned. It is quite clear from the statute[1] that the board of supervisors must own the lot upon which the building is erected, and must convey it, after the completion of the building, to the board of education, who must hold it in trust for the county, and the acquisition of the lot is the first thing to be done. It is needless to inquire whether the title must be in absolute fee simple, for here the board has no title at all. The fact that the board at one time inadvertently accepted the offer of Ross and Bush was not of such force as to necessarily drive it onward to the commission of other unwarranted acts. Moreover, what did it accept? A mere promise made by two persons, without consideration, that another person would, upon the happening of certain contingencies, furnish to the board a conditional estate in a certain piece of land. The judgment is reversed.

[1] Act 1891, p. 58, § 3, requires the board of supervisors, after the people have elected to establish a county high school, "to estimate the cost of purchasing a suitable lot, erecting a building and furnishing the same, together with the cost of conducting the same for the next 12 months." Section 5 requires it, after the building is completed, to convey it to the board of education, "who shall hold the same in trust for the people."

PADEN v. GOLDBAUM et al. (No. 19,400.)

EXECUTION AGAINST HUSBAND — LEVY ON WIFE'S PROPERTY — EVIDENCE OF TITLE — PLEADINGS — FINDINGS.

1. In an action by a wife to recover for cattle alleged to be her separate property, but sold on execution by a judgment creditor of her husband, although the evidence shows that her husband returned the stock for taxation in his name, and had the use thereof for dairy purposes, and represented to the judgment creditor that he was owner thereof, if it appears that the stock was bought by the wife with money earned before marriage, and its increase was reserved as her property, a finding that the stock was in fact hers will not be disturbed.

2. Where the sole issue is the truth of the allegations of the answer, a finding "that the allegations of the separate defense contained in the answer of the defendant G. are untrue" is sufficient.

3. A finding that the allegations in the answer are untrue is justified when the only allegations therein are that the plaintiff, by her conduct, held out her husband as the owner of her separate stock seized on execution against him, and that, on faith thereof, credit was given the husband, and such allegations are contradicted by evidence showing that the creditor ordered the sheriff to seize the property in question, and gave a bond indemnifying such sheriff against the claim of the wife, and had constructive notice of such claim by a previously recorded statement of her separate property, including the stock seized.

4. Where an answer contains two separate defenses, viz. a denial of the allegations of the complaint, and a justification of the acts complained of, a finding for the plaintiff on the first defense renders a failure to find on the second immaterial.

5. Code Civ. Proc. § 689, as amended by Laws 1891, p. 20, provides that, if one claiming property seized on execution serves on the sheriff a sworn claim setting out his title and his right to possession, the sheriff need not keep the property, unless the execution plaintiff gives a bond of indemnity to him against such claim. Held, that proof of the service on the sheriff of such claim is admissible against the sheriff in an action by a claimant for the wrongful seizure of property, though it is not pleaded in the complaint, since the statute is for the benefit of the sheriff, and is matter of defense.

6. Where a husband pastures his wife's cattle in return for their use for dairy purposes, she reserving the increase, such use by the husband, accompanied by a representation on his part that they were his, cannot, in the absence of any such representation on her part, or any act tending to mislead one holding a judgment against her husband as to the ownership of the stock, estop the wife from setting up ownership to defeat an execution levied on the stock under such judgment.

7. An inventory of a wife's separate property, filed with the recorder, is admissible in evidence, against a judgment creditor of her husband, in an action to recover her separate property seized by him on execution, though the husband's debt to him was contracted before such filing, if the levy of execution was made subsequent thereto.

8. The account books of a judgment creditor are original evidence to establish claims against the debtor, and should be introduced as part of the case, and it is proper to exclude them when offered in rebuttal.

9. Evidence as to indorsements on a sheriff's writ of execution, whereby part of the property seized thereunder was surrendered as exempt, was properly excluded on the ground that its ownership was not in issue.

10. The testimony of a witness in regard to a conversation with the judgment creditor prior to the execution, wherein he offered to take a new note from the husband if the wife would sign it, was admissible to show that the creditor had knowledge that the property levied on was the property of the wife.

11. Where a witness testifies that he has been in the dairy business for seven years, and is familiar with the value of cattle for that business, his testimony as to the value of the cattle in suit is admissible, although he has not seen them for a year previous to the execution.

12. Code Civ. Proc. § 437, provides that "where the complaint is not verified a general denial is sufficient." Held, that where an unverified complaint alleges the value of property converted, and the answer is a general denial, the value is put in issue.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by Flora J. Paden against Simon Goldbaum and B. F. Hubbert for the conversion of live stock. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Aitken & Smith and Hunsaker, Goodrich & McCutcheon, for appellants. Withington & Pearson and J. P. Pearson, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. In this action the plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial. The complaint alleged that on January 13, 1893, the plaintiff, the wife of Alfred Paden, was the owner of certain milch cows and other cattle, and of certain horses and other personal property; that defendants, knowing that it was her separate property, took possession, and converted it to their own use, under the false pretenses that it was the property of her husband, to her damage in the sum of $3,000. Hubbert justified, alleging that he was a constable, and took the property under a writ of execution issued upon a judgment in favor of his codefendant against Alfred Paden, whom he alleged was the owner. Goldbaum denied all the allegations of the complaint, and alleged the recovering of the judgment; that he was a merchant; that Alfred Paden conducted a dairy, milk, and stock ranch, and used said stock as the owner; that during said time he extended credit to Alfred Paden, and that the plaintiff, by her acts and conduct, represented the fact to be that her husband was the owner, and permitted him to represent himself to be the owner, of the property in question; that the conduct of both was such as to imply and cause defendant to believe that Alfred Paden was the owner; that he gave credit because thereof; that he had no knowledge of any claim of ownership by plaintiff, and in giving credit relied upon said acts, conduct, representations, and declarations of the plaintiff; and that he would be injured by allowing the truth thereof to be disproved by plaintiff. Findings were for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered against both defendants for the sum of $1,160.

The finding that plaintiff was the owner of the property is attacked. The evidence tends to show that the husband was the owner of about 200 acres of land; that his wife was the owner of the stock; that under an arrangement between them the husband had the use of the stock for conducting the milk business, the wife to have the increase of the stock. There seems to be no doubt that the husband used and spoke of the property as his own, and sold and bought and traded portions of it with the consent of his wife, and returned the property for taxation in his own name. It does not appear, however, that she ever spoke of the property as his, while it does appear that there were rumors in the neighborhood that the stock belonged to her. That her money earned by her before her marriage was invested in stock, and that she was in fact the owner of the stock in question, is, I think, justified by the weight of the evidence; but, if it were doubtful, the conflict is such as to prevent the appellate court from disturbing the finding.

The plaintiff offered in evidence an inventory of property claimed therein to be her separate property, dated April 20, 1891, and filed with the recorder May 7, 1891, which included part of the property in question; the remainder, as plaintiff claimed, being the increase of the stock therein mentioned, or other stock replacing that which had been sold or exchanged. This inventory was received in evidence over defendants' objection. Defendants contend that the statute makes such inventory notice and prima facie evidence of the title of the wife, but only from the date of filing, while the indebtedness of the husband to Goldbaum was contracted in 1888, and that it was therefore inadmissible to prove notice and title at the time the debt was created. Very true; but it was admissible to prove notice of her claim at the time of the levy of the execution, to the extent, at least, that the stock therein described was seized under the execution. If defendant Goldbaum's plea of estoppel had been sustained, it might be that the evidence would not benefit the plaintiff, but that did not affect its admissibility.

As to defendant Goldbaum's answer, the court found "that the allegations of the separate defense contained in the answer of defendant Simon Goldbaum are untrue." This finding is said to be insufficient, and that it is not supported by the evidence. As to the sufficiency of this finding, counsel cite Goodnow v. Griswold, 68 Cal. 603, 9 Pac. 837. In that case the court found specifically several facts, and then made the following finding: "The court finds that the several allegations of said complaint not in conflict with the foregoing findings are true." But what allegations were or were not in conflict with the findings made were not specified by the trial court, and that question the appellate court held it was not called upon to determine. The sufficiency of the finding here made is sustained by Johnson v. Klein, 70 Cal. 186, 11 Pac. 606; Moore v. Waterworks, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. 816; Williams v. Hall, 79 Cal. 606, 21 Pac. 965. The new matter in the answer was deemed denied, and, as no new matter was or could be pleaded thereto, the sole issue was as to the truth of the averments of the answer, and that was determined by the finding. Whether that finding is justified by the evidence will be considered hereafter.

It is also assigned for error that the court failed to find upon defendant Hubbert's answer. This answer contained two defenses; the first consisting wholly of denials of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, and the second a justification under the writ of execution. The findings cover the issues raised by the first defense, and, those issues having been found for the plaintiff, a finding that defendant Hubbert had a writ, and took the property under it, would not have affected the conclusion of law that plaintiff was entitled to judgment. A finding thereon was therefore immaterial, unless counsel are correct in the construction given by them to section 689, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1891 (Laws 1891, p. 20), a question we shall now consider. Section 689, Code Civ. Proc., prior to the amendment, provided for a sheriff's jury to try the claim of a third person to property levied upon by the officer. That section, as amended, is as follows: "689. If the property levied on be claimed by a third person as his property by a written claim verified by the oath of said claimant, setting out his title thereto, his right to the possession thereof, and stating the grounds of such title, and served upon the sheriff, the sheriff is not bound to keep the property unless the plaintiff, or the person in whose favor the writ of execution runs, on demand, indemnify the sheriff against such claim by an undertaking by at least two good and sufficient sureties; and no claim to such property is valid against the sheriff, or shall be received, or be notice of any rights, unless made as above provided." Upon the trial, plaintiff was permitted, over the objection of defendants, to prove the service of a written claim—in all respects conforming to the above provision—upon the constable prior to the sale of the property, the objection being made upon the specific ground that the complaint did not allege service of such claim. The argument is that under this statute there can be no recovery against the officer unless such claim is served; that it cannot be given in evidence unless it is pleaded; and that, therefore, the justification set up in the answer is a good defense, notwithstanding plaintiff's ownership, and therefore a finding of the facts constituting a justification would sustain a judgment in favor of the officer, and was material, and should have been made.

The first question here presented is one of pleading. In statutory actions a compliance with all the provisions conferring the right must be alleged. People v. Jackson, 24 Cal. 630. This, however, is not a statutory action, but one which existed at common law. The former statute, as well as the amendment, was intended for the protection of the officer, and is therefore matter of defense. It is an exception to a general right which need not be alleged in the complaint. 1 Chit. Pl. *p. 247. If the plaintiff had omitted to make the verified claim required by the amendment, the omission, if it could operate as a protection to the officer in this form of action, should in such case be alleged in the answer. The making or omitting to make the verified claim does not affect the ownership of the plaintiff, but, if not made, excepts the officer from liability in certain actions, and is matter of defense. "Wherever there is a circumstance, the omission of which is to defeat the plaintiff's right of action, prima facie well founded, whether called by the name of a 'proviso' or a 'condition subsequent,' it must, in its nature, be a matter of defense, and ought to be shown in pleading by the opposite party." 1 Chit. Pl. *p. 246. The case of Himmelmann v. Danos, 35 Cal. 447, cited by appellants, is not applicable here. That was an action to enforce a lien upon a lot for macadamizing a street, and the complaint did not allege the proceeding required by the statute. The case of Barry v. McGrade, 14 Minn. 163 (Gil. 126), cited by appellants, sustains their contention, although the question of pleading is not discussed. The statute there considered was similar to ours, and it was held that the plaintiff must prove the service of the affidavit of claim in order to maintain the action. If it is necessary to be proved by the plaintiff in chief, so as to prevent a nonsuit, it must be alleged in the complaint. We cannot, however, assent to the reasoning or the conclusion of the court in that case. In the absence of the statute, the right of the plaintiff depends solely upon ownership; and it must be apparent that if the plaintiff, being in fact the owner, cannot recover, it must be because the statute exempts the defendant from liability, and not because it controverts the fact of ownership. It could no more be necessary for the plaintiff to anticipate a claim on the part of the officer that he was not liable because a verified claim was not served than to anticipate the plea of estoppel by Goldbaum by alleging facts inconsistent with that defense. It is entirely analogous to pleading the statute of frauds or the statute of limitations, which must be taken by answer, unless the defense appears on the face of the complaint when it may be reached by demurrer. If the verified claim had not been offered in evidence by the plaintiff, the omission would not have availed the defendant Hubbert, since he had not alleged that a verified claim was not served. The result was that the plaintiff disproved a defense not made,—a circumstance which could not prejudice the defendant. Whether the failure of a plaintiff to serve such verified claim would be a defense to an action for damages for the conversion of the property, or only to an action in claim and delivery to recover possession of the property from the officer (a question discussed by counsel), need not be considered here, in view of the conclusion reached upon the question of pleading.

It is also contended that the second finding is not justified by the evidence, in that there is no evidence that defendant Goldbaum took possession of the property, or directed or aided any one to take possession, or that he disposed of it. The officer took the property under a written direction from Goldbaum's attorney, of which the following is a copy: "You are instructed to levy upon all the horned and neat cattle, horses, and other personal property (excepting household furniture) of the defendant, whether said cattle and property be at defendant's place of business, at Oceanside, or at his farm, at San Luis Rey; and you are instructed to have all milch cows regularly and properly milked while in your possession, prior to sale." It does not appear that there was any other property of that description at either of the places mentioned than that levied upon, and all of it, Goldbaum testified, he believed to be owned by Mr. Paden, and the attorney who gave the instruction testified, in substance, that, before he gave the instruction, Mr. Paden told him it was his property; and hence there is no question that the instruction was intended to cover the property in controversy, and required the officer to levy upon it. Not only so, but the constable required from Goldbaum a bond of indemnity, and this was given. Independently of the rumor which Goldbaum says he heard, about the time he commenced his suit against Mr. Paden, that this property belonged to the wife, he had also at least constructive notice of her recorded claim, and following this came the demand from the officer for a bond of indemnity. Whether this demand was accompanied by notice of plaintiff's verified claim does not clearly appear. But it was after the seizure, and before the sale. An indemnity bond had been previously given, but whether before or after the seizure does not appear. The additional bond was given, and operated as a ratification of the taking, and was in effect a request, if not a direction, to sell notwithstanding the plaintiff's claim, since, under section 689, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1891, the officer "is not bound to keep the property unless the plaintiff * * * on demand, indemnify the sheriff against such claim by an undertaking," etc. Whether, upon receiving the bond, the officer is bound to keep possession and sell, it is not necessary to consider. The finding in question is justified by the evidence.

It is also urged by appellants that, if the finding against defendant Goldbaum's plea of estoppel is sufficient, such finding is not justified by the evidence. Mrs. Paden testified that the arrangement between herself and husband was that he pastured the stock for the use of the cattle, and she had the increase. This contract she had a right to make, and the use of the stock under it by the husband could not of itself create an estoppel against his wife. The objection here urged necessarily concedes that she is the owner; and no one else, the arrangement itself being lawful, reasonable, and proper, could, by word or act, create an estoppel against her. So far as the estoppel pleaded relates to the time when the indebtedness which was finally merged in the judgment was created, there was no evidence which tended to support the plea. Mr. Goldbaum testified that at the time credit was given "he (Paden) was running a dairy there, and had cattle and land, and I thought he was good. He was running it in his own name. Mrs. Paden was living with him at the time as his wife. She got some of those groceries from me. * * * Mrs. Paden never notified me that she owned any of the cows during the running of this bill, nor that she owned this business, or owned any of the stock." He did not testify to any act or statement done or made by Mrs. Paden which misled him, or that she was at any time called upon to assert her ownership, and was silent, or that she intentionally or deliberately led him to believe that her husband was the owner of the stock, or to act on such belief. Section 1962, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act or omission, intentionally or deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act or omission, be permitted to falsify it." We find no evidence upon which a finding in favor of the defendant upon his plea of estoppel could be sustained, whether it relates to the period when credit was given, or the time when the execution was levied. That the husband generally spoke of the property as his is doubtless true, but it does not appear that he ever spoke so of it when the question of ownership was discussed, or otherwise than casually in connection with the dairy business he was conducting. But if he had asserted his ownership when that was a material question, unless it was with the knowledge of the wife, and the defendant was misled by her silence when she was called upon to assert her ownership, her title to the property would not be affected. There would be little protection given the wife in respect to her separate property, if, upon the facts of this case, it could be taken to satisfy the husband's debt. There is nothing in Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 90 Cal. 159, 27 Pac. 71, inconsistent with our conclusion, nor is it necessary to comment upon the cases cited from other states, since if they laid down a different rule from that prescribed by the Code, they could not be authority here.

Defendants called a witness in rebuttal, and asked him whether he had any conversation with Mr. Paden since January 11th, about a visit paid to the Padens that day? The court, of its own motion, interposed, saying, "We cannot have this sort of testimony for the purpose of convicting Mr. Paden upon an immaterial point." Counsel thereupon offered to prove by the witness Hayes and by defendant Hubbert that, a few days after the 11th day of January, Mr. Paden said to the witnesses named that he (the counsel) "had been at their house, and as he expressed it, was doing some detective work, and he had acknowledged to me at the time the cattle were his." Counsel for plaintiff did not object to the offer, but the court ruled that it was not competent evidence, saying to counsel for the plaintiff, "If you are willing that it should go in, I do not know that I ought to say it should not, but it would take another day to finish the case, and I will not admit it." The conversation referred to was given in the testimony of counsel, during the examination of defendants' witnesses in chief, to the effect that Mr. Paden, in a conversation with the witness before the execution was issued,—the plaintiff being present,—said he was running the dairy; that witness asked him whose cattle they were, and "he said they were his cattle." In rebuttal, Mr. Paden gave a different account of the conversation. Counsel, at the time of this conversation, was at Paden's house on other business. Mrs. Paden was at work making butter, and took no part in the conversation. Nothing was said in regard to Goldbaum's claim, or of any effort to collect it. The inquiry was apparently without motive, and did not call for any remark by Mrs. Paden. That she should remain silent was natural. Under the circumstances, she was not affected by the statement of her husband, conceding it to have been as testified to by defendants' counsel; and, if so, the proposed evidence was immaterial, unless for the purpose of impeaching Mr. Paden's testimony in chief, so far as it tended to prove Mrs. Paden's ownership, by showing that he had made statements inconsistent with his testimony. The evidence being immaterial for any other purpose, all testimony tending to show such contradictory statements should have been given by the defendants in chief, and no part of it could be reserved to rebut plaintiff's rebuttal. The defendant can only rebut new matter brought out in plaintiff's rebuttal, unless the court, in its discretion, permits it.

Under these circumstances the exception will not avail appellants.

We think the court did not err in excluding Goldbaum's account books, offered by defendants in rebuttal. They were original evidence, and should have been introduced by defendants as part of their case. But, as defendants were allowed, without objection, to give oral evidence of the accounts, a liberal ruling would have permitted their introduction after plaintiff, in rebuttal, disputed the oral testimony. Defendants were not prejudiced, however, as the object of the evidence was to show that credit was given for merchandise because of Mr. Paden's supposed ownership,—a defense that was not sustained by the evidence.

The evidence offered to be shown by Edward J. Martin was properly excluded. What the attorney who drew up the declaration of separate property for Mrs. Paden said about it in her absence was clearly inadmissible, while the fact that it was necessary to go to Mrs. Paden before he could get title to the property would not have benefited defendants.

The indorsements on the constable's return, showing that certain of the property seized was claimed by Mr. Paden to be exempt from execution, and was surrendered to him, was properly excluded. That property was not in litigation, and it was immaterial to whom it belonged.

The testimony of Joseph Jones, a witness for plaintiff, to a conversation with defendant Goldbaum in October preceding the levy of the execution, was properly received. We have held that the instruction to the constable required him to levy upon the property here in question, so that the objection that Goldbaum had nothing to do with the levy is not tenable, while the answer of the witness shows that at that date Goldbaum knew that Mrs. Paden owned or claimed to own the property, and had offered to Paden to take a new note for half of the amount if Mrs. Paden would also sign it. This also disposes of the objection to a similar question put to William H. Libby.

The witness Olds testified that he had been in the dairy business for the last seven years, and was familiar with the values of cattle for dairy purposes; that he had seen these cattle two or three times, the last time being about one year before the trial. This was sufficient to qualify him to testify as to value. It is true he did not see the cattle at the time they were taken, and could not know their condition at that time, but if their condition had changed it was competent for defendants to have shown that fact. His testimony was not so satisfactory, for that reason, nor perhaps entitled to as much weight, as if he had seen them at the time of their conversion, but that was not sufficient to require its exclusion. But it was further objected that there was no issue as to the value. The complaint alleged the property converted to be of the value of $2,000. If no issue was taken upon this allegation, the defendants are not injured by the finding of damages at $1,186. But the complaint was not verified, and each of the defendants denied "each and every, and all and singular. the allegations of the complaint;" and this put in issue the value of the property converted, under section 437, Code Civ. Proc., which provides, "If the complaint be not verified a general denial is sufficient," and puts in issue every material allegation of the complaint.

Appellants, on their motion for new trial, specified 58 errors of law occurring on the trial. We have noticed only such of them as counsel have mentioned in their brief; but we have carefully read the entire record, and find no error justifying a reversal, and advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

102 Cal. 483

FOSTER v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (No. 15,501.)

LIQUOR LICENSES—INSURANCE BY CITY—REGULATION BY ORDINANCE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Const. 1879, art. 11, § 11, authorizes any city to make and enforce all such local, police, sanitary, or other regulations as are not in conflict with the general law. Act March 23, 1878, § 4, provides for certain requisites before licenses to sell liquor shall be issued in the city of San Francisco. Held, that the city, by ordinance, could require additional requisites in the persons to whom such licenses were to be issued.

2. An ordinance providing that licenses to sell liquor shall not be granted to persons who have employed females as waitresses is not unconstitutional as being an ex post facto law, since it is not a criminal law.

3. San Francisco City Ordinance No. 1589, as amended by No. 2637, which prohibits the issuance of liquor licenses to any person who has carried on or is carrying on his business in a certain manner, applies to those who carried on their business in such manner before the adoption of the ordinance.

4. Such an ordinance is not invalid in that it discriminates between different persons.

5. An ordinance of the city of San Francisco regulating the issuance of liquor licenses, which applies to the entire city and county, is not special legislation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandamus by Edgar M. Foster against the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook, for appellant. H. T. Creswell, City and Co. Atty., for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Appellant petitioned the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel the board of police commissioners to consent to the issuance to him of a license as a retail liquor dealer. An alternative writ was granted, and upon the return thereof the defendants demurred to the petition, and this appeal is from the judgment entered thereon, dismissing the writ.

Appellant was the proprietor of the Bella Union Theater, and in connection therewith had a saloon, in which, prior to May 1, 1893, females were employed to wait upon those who patronized his place of business. His license for the theater was from April 15 to September 15, 1893. His license for the sale of liquor expired June 1, 1893. On May 1st he closed his place of business for repairs. On June 12, 1893, he applied to the license collector for a retail liquor dealer's license, and that officer refused to issue it, and gave as the ground of such refusal that the board of police commissioners had, in writing, directed him not to issue such license to appellant, for the reason that appellant, prior to that time, had employed and permitted females to wait upon customers therein. The petition further alleged that he applied to said board of police commissioners for such consent, assuring them that "he did not intend to, and would not, if such license was granted to him as requested, either procure or suffer any females to wait on or attend in any manner any person in his place of business," and also tendered a recommendation, in writing, of 12 citizens owning real property in the block in which his said business was to be carried on, that such license be granted. This application was denied upon the ground that appellant had prior thereto employed and permitted females to wait upon customers in his said place of business; and the sole question to be determined upon this appeal is the validity of an ordinance approved July 28, 1880, known as "Order No. 1589," as amended May 22, 1893, by Order No. 2637. The material part of the amended section, so far as this appeal is concerned, is as follows: "Provided, however, as a police measure for the suppression of public vice, immorality and crime, that no license shall be granted under this section, upon the recommendation of citizens or otherwise, to any person who has been convicted of felony, or to any person who has carried on, is carrying on, or is about to carry on the business of selling or furnishing spirituous, malt or fermented liquors or wines in any dance cellar or dance hall, or in any place where females are suffered or procured to wait or attend in any manner on any person, and wherein also any musical, theatrical or other public exhibition or performance is exhibited or performed, or in connection with any resort for lewd, immoral or unlawful purposes." Appellant contends that this ordinance is void, and bases this contention upon several grounds.

That the act of March 23, 1878, is a part of the consolidation act or charter of the city of San Francisco, that this act was not repealed by the constitution of 1879, and that the amended ordinance is in conflict therewith.

The second subdivision of section 4 of that act is as follows: "Those making sales of less than $15,000 per quarter shall pay a license of twenty dollars per quarter; provided, that on and after January 1, 1879, no license as a retail liquor dealer shall be issued by the collector of license unless the person desiring the same shall have obtained the written consent of a majority of the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco to carry on or conduct said business; but in case of refusal of such consent, upon application, said board of police commissioners shall grant the same upon the written recommendation of not less than twelve citizens of San Francisco owning real estate in the block or square in which said business of retail liquor dealer is to be carried on, or in the four blocks or squares bounding the same." St. 1877-78, p. 444. It may be conceded that the constitution of 1879 did not repeal the act of 1878, but the act in question was purely local, applicable only to the city and county of San Francisco, and was upon a subject included within section 11 of article 11 of the constitution, which provides as follows: "Any county, city, town or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary or other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." The power to legislate upon such subjects, thus given to the city, necessarily includes the power to amend an existing regulation upon the same subject, and this authority expressly given in the constitution obviates all necessity of any authority being given upon the same subject in the charter. While this case presents some questions not heretofore considered by this court, the power of the board of supervisors to amend the former ordinance has been considered and decided. See Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 208, 24 Pac. 747; Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 11 Sup. Ct. 13; Ex parte Hayes, 98 Cal. 556, 33 Pac. 337. And in the case last cited it was held that the ordinance here in question is a valid exercise of the power conferred by that provision of the constitution hereinbefore quoted.

It is further insisted by appellant that the amended ordinance in question, so far, at least, as it affects this case, is void (1) because it is ex post facto, and imposes a penalty and consequence for an act that was done prior to the passage of the order; (2) because the ordinance is not equal and uniform in its operation; and (3) that it is special legislation.

The ordinance in question is not an ex post facto law, within the meaning of the constitution of this state or of the United States. In Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. 110, it was said: "The phrase 'ex post facto laws,' is not applicable to civil laws, but to penal and criminal laws, which punish a party for acts antecedently done, which were not punishable at all, or not punishable to the extent or in the manner prescribed." In Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 267, in speaking of bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts, it was said: "The first two of these prohibitions apply to laws of a criminal, and the last to laws of a civil, character." And such is the uniform construction given by all the authorities. The ordinance in question punishes no past act committed, done, or suffered to be done by appellant. It simply furnishes a standard, applicable to all persons, by which their fitness to conduct a business in itself dangerous to the morals and good order of the city shall be measured. As was said by Field, J., in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 91, 11 Sup. Ct. 13: "The statistics of every state show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than to any other source. The sale of such liquors has therefore been, at all times, by the courts of every state, considered as the proper subject of legislative regulation. There is no inherent right in a citizen thus to sell intoxicating liquors by retail." See, also, Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 342. In that case, after discussing other questions, the court further said: "We, however, find in the return a statement which would fully justify the action of the commissioners. It is averred that in the conduct of the liquor business the petitioner was assisted by his wife, and that she was twice arrested for larcenies committed from persons visiting his saloon, and in one case convicted of the offense and sentenced to be imprisoned, and in the other held to answer. These larcenies alone were a sufficient indication of the character of the place in which the business was conducted for the exercise of the discretion of the police commissioners in refusing a further license to the petitioner." If the past offenses of Christensen's wife were sufficient to justify a refusal to grant a license to him, certainly the past conduct of appellant, in employing females, though not then prohibited by law, is quite as conclusive evidence of his unfitness to conduct a saloon. His protestation that he did not intend to and would not in the future procure or permit females to wait upon his customers, does not aid him. A man who has in the past shown himself willing to debauch the morals of the community to increase his business would not in the future refrain from any line of conduct, in the prosecution of his business, which would not bring upon himself, personally, the penalty of the law, whatever of evil it might bring to others. The ordinance was therefore not only constitutional, but wise, and should be scrupulously observed by those intrusted with its execution.

But appellant contends that the ordinance, properly construed, applies only to those who have, since its adoption, violated its provisions. But this construction cannot be sustained. The language is too explicit to admit it. Though not an ex post facto law, it is retrospective in so far as it determines from the past conduct of the party his fitness for the proposed business. Felons are also excluded from obtaining such license, not as an additional punishment, but because the conviction of a felony is evidence of the unfitness of such persons, as a class. Nor can we perceive why such evidence should be more conclusive of unfitness, were the act done after the passage of the ordinance than if done before.

It is also insisted that the ordinance under consideration is objectionable for want of uniformity, and that it discriminates between different persons. That it affects all persons of certain classes without discrimination, and as to them acts uniformly, cannot be questioned. The question, however, is as to the power to discriminate at all. The power thus to discriminate is well settled by the authorities hereinbefore cited, and by many others. This power is exercised in relation to many other occupations besides that of selling liquor, and, when promotive of the best interests of the people, is always sustained. The occupation of engineers and pilots on vessels, and of druggists, physicians, lawyers, and others, are confined by law to persons having certain qualifications, and who are licensed therefor, upon the ground that the protection of the life, health, and welfare of the people at large require those who pursue these avocations to have those qualifications which will prevent, as far as possible, the evils which would result from ignorance and incompetency. Counsel, quoting from Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 145, 8 Pac. 813, say: "The legislature cannot discriminate or grant an indulgence to one which is not accorded to another." But the legislature does discriminate, and in many cases properly, while in those cases where the public is affected only by depriving an individual of a right common to all others, the exercise of which is not attended with evil consequences, the above quotation applies.

Nor is it special legislation. If it had been enacted by the legislature, being applicable only to the city and county of San Francisco, it would have been special legislation, because restricted to a portion of the state; but being enacted by the city and county, under the authority of the constitution, and not restricted to a part of the city and county, it is, as to the city and county, a general law.

As to the supposed conflict with the laws of the state, that question is settled by Ex parte Christensen and Ex parte Hayes, supra.

Many other points are made by counsel for appellant, all of which have been considered, but, as the points decided are necessarily conclusive of the case, they need not be noticed here. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

104 Cal. 35

BELL v. PECK et al. (No. 18,266.)

ACTION ON CONSTABLE'S BOND—JOINDER OF PARTIES AND ACTIONS—OPENING DEFAULT—DISCRETION OF COURT—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. In an action on a constable's bond, on account of the illegal seizure of plaintiff's property by the principal in the bond, there is no misjoinder of parties on the ground that the sureties, whose obligation is one of contract, are joined with the principal, sued as a trespasser.

2. An action against a constable for injury to property, in which the sureties on his bond are joined, does not improperly join two causes of action.

3. On a showing that, pending suit, defendants' attorneys had moved from the county, and had no notice of a transfer of the case to another department of the superior court, though such notice and notice of trial were published in a newspaper of general circulation, and that they were not present at the trial, and did not know of the judgment until after its entry, an order refusing to open up the judgment was not an abuse of the discretion vested in the court in such cases by Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

4. A judgment rendered in the alternative, that defendant must pay for the property converted, or return the same, will not be disturbed at the instance of the defendant, for whose benefit the alternative was inserted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Action by T. A. Bell against P. F. Peck, constable, as principal, and Victor and Noble, sureties, for breach of condition in the constable's bond. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stanton L. Carter and Newman Jones, for appellants. E. D. Edwards, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. This action is brought against the defendant Peck, as principal, and the defendants Victor and Noble, as sureties on Peck's official bond as constable, to recover damages for breach of the condition thereof "that he and said Peck would well, truly, and faithfully perform the duties of his said office during his said term." The breach of official duty complained of is that Peck, in his official capacity as constable, under and by virtue of an "attachment or execution" issued against the property of other parties, illegally seized and converted the property of plaintiff described in the complaint. The complaint was demurred to generally upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and specially upon the following, among other grounds not necessary to be stated: (1) That the defendants Victor and Noble, sued for breach of contract, were improperly joined with the defendant Peck, sued as a trespasser; (2) that several causes of action were improperly joined, to wit, a cause of action for injuries to property and a cause of action founded on contract. The demurrer was properly overruled upon these grounds, on the authority of Van Pelt v. Littler, 14 Cal. 194; Black v. Clasby, 97 Cal. 482, 32 Pac. 564; and Sam Yuen v. McMann, 99 Cal. 497, 34 Pac. 80. The case of Ghiradelli v. Bourland, 32 Cal. 585, cited by appellants as authority to the contrary, is not in point. As to the other grounds of demurrer, it is sufficient to say they are equally untenable. Upon the overruling of the demurrer the defendants answered, and thereupon, without notice to the defendants or their attorney, the case was assigned or transferred by the judges of the superior court of Fresno county from department 2, where it had laid without being set for trial for more than two years, to department 3 of that court, and by them ordered to be placed on the trial calendar of that department. Notice was thereafter published in two newspapers of general circulation in that county that on April 4, 1893, this calendar would be called, and the cases thereon set for trial; and on that day it was called, and this case set for trial in that department for June 22d following. Afterwards this calendar was published in the same newspapers, and on the day stated the case was called for trial, and, neither of the defendants or their attorney appearing, the court proceeded with the trial of the cause, and, after hearing the evidence offered by plaintiff, gave judgment in his favor for the return of the property described in the complaint, or the value thereof, with interest and costs in case delivery could not be had. Afterwards, on the 31st day of July, following, the defendants moved the court to vacate and set aside the judgment, on the ground that it was given against them through the "inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect" of themselves and their attorney. The application was made upon notice and affidavits, including one of merits, duly served, and the pleadings and record in the case, and was resisted by two opposing affidavits, the whole of one of them and the greater part of the other being in opposition to defendants' affidavit of merits, and to that extent are, upon well-settled authority, improper to be considered in a proceeding of this character. The affidavits upon which the motion was made show, in addition to what has been stated, that defendants' attorney moved from Fresno county some time in November, 1892, and that he "has resided without and been absent from said county during the whole of the time, except about two weeks in May, 1893;" that neither he nor the defendants, or either of them, were present on April 4th, when the trial calendar was called in department 3, and this case ordered to be set for trial on June 22d, nor did they, or either of them, have any notice whatever thereof, nor were they, or either of them, present on the day the case was called for trial and tried, nor did they, or either of them, have any notice thereof, or of the judgment rendered therein, until after the date of its entry. It further appears from the only material part of the counter affidavits filed in this proceeding that the defendant Peck, during all of the time referred to, commencing January, 1893, was an under or deputy sheriff of that county, and as such was in attendance and waiting upon the different departments of the superior court thereof.

The application for relief is based upon the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is addressed to the discretion of the court. Hence it follows that, unless it manifestly appears from the showing made that the court below abused the sound legal discretion thus vested in it by the statute, its action in denying the defendants' motion to vacate and set aside the judgment is not the subject of review here.

It is claimed by appellants that the court below abused its discretion in making the order appealed from, because they had no notice of the assignment of the case to department 3, nor of the regular calling of the trial calendar, and the setting of the case for trial in that department. We have been referred to no rule of that court providing for any such notice, and certainly none is required to be given by the statute. Dusy v. Prudom, 95 Cal. 646, 30 Pac. 798; Eltzroth v. Ryan, 91 Cal. 587, 27 Pac. 932. It may be, however, that where a party to an action makes application to a department of the superior court where the same is pending for an order transferring the case from that department to another department of the same court, the rule would be that notice of such application should be duly served on the opposite party. But such is not the rule where the judges of the superior court, for the more convenient dispatch of business, as was the case here, or for any other reason they may deem necessary, make an order assigning or transferring cases for trial to any one or more of the several departments of such court. The case of Cottrill v. Cottrill, 83 Cal. 457, 23 Pac. 531, cited by appellants, is not in conflict with these views. In that case it was held that "to transfer a case from one department to another, and try it on the same day, without any notice whatever to the opposite party, is a very abrupt proceeding, from which, in a divorce case at least, it is not improper to relieve the absent party." That was a divorce case, and in such cases the rule is well settled that courts should be very liberal in relieving a party from a judgment obtained against him under such circumstances, for the reason that the public, as well as the parties to the action, has an interest in the result thereof. The nature of that action, and the unseemly haste with which the case, after its transfer, was rushed to trial, in the absence and without the knowledge of the defendant or his attorneys, were the grounds upon which it was held by this court that the defendant was properly relieved from the judgment obtained against him.

Upon the facts disclosed by the affidavits in this proceeding we cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in denying appellants' motion to vacate and set aside the judgment.

It is further claimed by appellants that the judgment is erroneous because rendered in the alternative. Conceding, for the purpose of this case, that the claim is well founded, we do not think that appellants are in a position to complain, for they are not only not injured by the judgment as rendered, but it is decidedly to their advantage, for they are accorded by it the privilege of avoiding the payment of the judgment by returning the property.

The remaining errors complained of are not necessary to be considered, as they are either untenable or immaterial. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

BAINES v. BABCOCK et al. (WEST COAST LUMBER CO. et al., Interveners).

(No. 19,352.)

CORPORATION — ACTION AGAINST STOCKHOLDER—UNPAID SUBSCRIPTIONS — CREDITORS' BILL—INTERVENTION BY OTHER CREDITORS—JOINDER OF PARTIES.

1. In an action by a judgment creditor of a corporation for an unpaid subscription of stock, a statement in the complaint that the action is brought on behalf of plaintiff "and all other creditors who may come in and contribute to the costs and expenses" will not entitle a simple contract creditor to be made a party thereto, as he is not entitled to the relief asked for.

2. An order appended to a judgment in a suit by a judgment creditor of a corporation against a stockholder for an unpaid subscription of stock, that the "cause be retained, and that any other judgment creditor * * * who shall make a proper showing * * * be allowed to become a party," refers only to persons who were judgment creditors at the time the order was made.

3. Where a judgment creditor of a corporation improperly intervenes in an action by another judgment creditor against a stockholder of the corporation for an unpaid subscription of stock, and his complaint states a good cause of action against the stockholder, the allegations as to intervention will be regarded as redundant, and the complaint treated as an independent and original one.

4. Judgment creditors of a corporation, holding separate judgments, may join in a suit against a stockholder for an unpaid subscription to stock.

5. In an action by a judgment creditor of a corporation for an unpaid subscription to stock, a judgment in an action by another judgment creditor against the same stockholder, rendered two years before, is not evidence of the indebtedness of the stockholder to the corporation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by W. E. Baines, a judgment creditor of the San Diego Street-Car Company, against Babcock and Story, stockholders, to recover an unpaid subscription to stock. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and afterwards the West Coast Lumber Company and C. J. Fox, other judgment creditors of the company, intervened and had judgment, from which defendants appeal. Reversed.

Luce & McDonald and Gibson & Titus, for appellants. Trippett, Boone & Neale, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. As indicated by the title, the controversy here is solely between the alleged interveners and two of the defendants in the action as originally commenced. The action, as originally commenced against Babcock, Story, San Diego Street-Car Company, et al., was of the nature of a creditors' bill in equity to subject equitable assets of the street-car company, a corporation, to the satisfaction of a judgment against it in favor of the plaintiff. It was averred in the complaint that Babcock and Story and certain other defendants were the owners and holders of a large number of shares of stock of the street-car corporation, on which shares they had paid only 50 per cent. of their par value, and that they were indebted to that corporation for the unpaid balance on their subscription for said stock. After the averment of other facts necessary to constitute a cause of action, the prayer was, in substance, that so much of said indebtedness of each of the defendants to the street-car company as might be necessary for that purpose be applied to the payment of plaintiff's said judgment against the street-car company, and that plaintiff have execution therefor against said stockholders. The introductory clause of that complaint is in the following language: "The plaintiff, for himself and all other creditors of the San Diego Street-Car Company who may come in and be made parties to this action, and contribute to the costs and expenses of the prosecution thereof, complains and alleges." On July 2, 1890, no other creditors having come in, or been made parties to the action, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff according to the prayer of his complaint; and in addition to the judgment prayed for, and without any finding that there was any other creditor of the street-car company than the plaintiff, the judgment contains the following paragraph: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that this cause be retained, and that any other judgment creditor of the defendant corporation, the San Diego Street-Car Company, who shall make a proper showing to the court of his right thereto, be allowed to become a party to this suit, to establish his claim, and have execution against said defendants for such sum found due such creditor, not exceeding the uncollected balance of the amount herein found due from said defendants, respectively, to said corporation: provided that in no case shall any of said defendants be required to pay, nor shall execution issue against them for, any greater sum than the amount found due from them to the said corporation as aforesaid." The defendants appealed from the judgment in the original action, and from an order denying their motion for new trial, and this court affirmed the judgment and order. Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 27 Pac. 674, and 30 Pac. 776. But no question relating to said last paragraph of the judgment, or to the rights of other creditors of the street-car company, was involved in that appeal, or considered by the court. On September 12, 1892, being two years and two months after the rendition of the above-mentioned judgment, and more than a month after that judgment was finally affirmed by this court, the respondents herein, West Coast Lumber Company and C. J. Fox, applied to the superior court for leave to file in that case what they denominated their "Intervening and Supplemental Complaint," which was granted; and accordingly they filed it, and thereafter amended it. The introductory paragraph thereof is as follows: "Come now West Coast Lumber Company and C. J. Fox, for themselves and all other creditors of the defendant San Diego Street-Car Company who may come in and be made parties to this action, and contribute to the costs and expenses of the prosecution thereof; and they themselves, coming in and joining with the plaintiff in the prosecution of this action, and offering to contribute to the costs and expenses thereof, and by way of coming in under the previous order of this court and judgment herein, by leave of court, now file this, their amended complaint in intervention herein, and complain of the defendants and allege." Then follow allegations of facts constituting the interveners' cause of action against the defendants in the original action, founded on judgments in their favor against the street-car company obtained about 15 months after the rendition of the original judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Baines. In addition to the facts constituting a cause of action against the defendants, Babcock and Story, the intervening complaint set forth all the proceedings in the original action, including the judgment therein in favor of the plaintiff, Baines, and also alleged that the judgment in favor of Baines had been fully satisfied. The plaintiff, Baines, did not answer this so-called interveners' complaint, but the defendants, Babcock and Story (appellants), answered, denying, among other things, that either of them was indebted to the street-car corporation in any sum whatever, and specifically denying that any sum remained due or unpaid from either of them to said corporation upon the subscription price of any shares of the capital stock of said corporation, owned or held by either of them, as alleged in the intervention complaint. The court found for the alleged interveners, and thereupon rendered judgment as follows: "Now, therefore, by reason of said findings, and by reason of the law and the premises, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows: That the West Coast Lumber Company is a judgment creditor of the San Diego Street-Car Company in the sum of $6,184.45, upon a judgment duly made and given by the superior court of the county of San Diego, state of California, on the 14th day of October, 1891, in an action therein pending, wherein the said West Coast Lumber Company was plaintiff, and the San Diego Street-Car Company was defendant. That C. J. Fox is a judgment creditor of said San Diego Street-Car Company in the sum of $2,136.35, upon a judgment duly given and made by the superior court of the county of San Diego, state of California, on the 20th day of November, 1891, in an action in said court pending, entitled C. J. Fox, Plaintiff, vs. The San Diego Street Car Company, Defendant. That each of said judgments remains wholly unpaid, together with interest thereon at the legal rate since the respective renditions thereof. That each of said parties has properly come in and become parties to this action, and established their claims as provided in the decree hitherto entered herein on the 2d day of July, 1890. That the defendant E. S. Babcock, Jr., has not paid the amount adjudged to be due from him to the said San Diego Street-Car Company, or any part thereof, and the said defendant is still indebted to said San Diego Street-Car Company in the sum of $48,600. That the defendant H. L. Story has not paid the amount adjudged to be due from him to said San Diego Street-Car Company, or any part thereof, and the said defendant is still indebted to said San Diego Street-Car Company in the sum of $21,275. That the claim of W. E. Baines has been fully paid and satisfied. That the said West Coast Lumber Company and C. J. Fox have and recover of and from the said defendants, Babcock and Story, the amount of their respective judgments, with interest, but not to exceed the amount decreed to be due from said Babcock and said Story, respectively, to said San Diego Street-Car Company. That said West Coast Lumber Company and C. J. Fox share pro rata, according to the amount of their respective claims, any sums recovered of either of said defendants. That said interveners have execution against said defendants for the amounts above decreed to be due them, respectively. Done in open court this 1st day of June, 1893. W. L. Pierce, Judge." The defendants appealed from this judgment within 60 days from the entry thereof, upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions specifying alleged errors in law and fact.

2. Respondents contend, however, that they came in as parties under the order of the court appended to the original judgment, to the effect that the "cause be retained, and that any other judgment creditor * * * who shall make a proper showing * * * be allowed to become a party," etc. But there was nothing in the pleadings upon which to rest this order, except the aforesaid redundant surplusage in the complaint, upon which nothing in the judgment, other than surplusage, could have been founded. But, even if it be conceded that the order is valid, it refers only to persons who were judgment creditors at the time it was made, and not to those who may have become such 15 months or 15 years thereafter. For additional authorities under this head, see Pom. Code Rem. (3d Ed.) 388-400.

3. Although the respondents never became parties to the original action, I think their so-called "Complaint in Intervention" may be regarded and treated as an independent original complaint, and as such is sufficient, notwithstanding the redundant matter relating to the action of Baines v. Babcock, which does not vitiate the complaint, if otherwise good. Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 33, 28 Pac. 788; Carey v. Brown, 58 Cal. 180. Without this redundant matter the complaint states a cause of action similar to that stated in Baines v. Babcock, which was held sufficient by this court. 95 Cal. 582, 27 Pac. 674, and 30 Pac. 776. But the complaint was demurred to on the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff, and appellants contend that the demurrer should have been sustained on this ground. But I think there is no misjoinder. Owen v. Frink, 24 Cal. 171; People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 360; Pom. Code Rem. (3d Ed.) 267, and notes.

4. Upon the issues as to whether the defendants were indebted to the San Diego Car Company, and as to whether that company had refused or neglected to levy an assessment, as alleged in respondents' complaint, the court found as follows: "That only fifty per cent. of the par value of the shares of the capital stock of the San Diego Street-Car Company, alleged in said complaint to be held and owned by said defendants, Babcock and Story, respectively, have been paid. That said defendants, respectively, agreed to pay the remaining fifty per cent. alleged to be due upon said shares. That there is due and unpaid from the defendant Story, upon his subscription to said capital stock, the sum of $21,275. That there is due and unpaid from the defendant Babcock, upon his subscription to said capital stock, the sum of $48,600. That the San Diego Street-Car Company has neglected and refused to make or levy any assessment upon any share or shares of its capital stock held by said defendants, or either of them." The appellants contend that neither of these findings is justified by the evidence, and I think this point should be sustained. The only evidence claimed to have any tendency to support either of these findings is the judgment roll in the case of Baines v. Babcock, to which, as we have seen, neither of the respondents here was a party. This judgment roll was admitted in evidence, against the objection of defendants on the grounds that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. I think it was incompetent and immaterial, and surely it had no tendency to prove that either of the defendants was indebted to the street-car company when respondents' complaint was filed, two years after the entry of the judgment in favor of Baines. Even as between defendants and Baines, that judgment only proved that defendants were indebted to the street-car company, and that the street-car company had failed to levy an assessment up to the time of the rendition thereof in favor of Baines; and it cannot be presumed that defendants did not pay their overdue debts to the street-car company, nor that the street-car company did not levy an assessment within the next following two years.

Upon the facts of this case, it is not necessary to decide whether or not section 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure was intended to authorize the practice of courts of equity, to its full extent, in permitting one plaintiff to sue on behalf of others, since even that practice does not permit the coming in of additional parties plaintiff, after judgment in favor of the original plaintiff, who were not qualified to come in before such judgment.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

HOWELL v. HOWELL. (No. 18,251.)

DIVORCE — GRANT OF ALIMONY AFTER FINAL DECREE.

After a final decree of divorce has been entered, in which alimony was not granted, the court has no jurisdiction to grant alimony, as Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139, only authorize the court to grant alimony "while an action for divorce is pending," and to "modify" its order.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

Action for divorce by Elizabeth Howell against T. N. Howell. From an order granting plaintiff alimony, defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. V. Hitchcock and A. M. McCoy, for appellant. Chas. G. Nagle (W. Henry Jones, of counsel), for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order of the superior court requiring him to pay to plaintiff $100 per month from January 20, 1892, until the further order of the court. On May 14, 1890, the parties were husband and wife, and on that day plaintiff commenced an action for divorce from defendant. She averred in her complaint, as ground for the divorce, desertion by the defendant; and she also averred that there were certain named minor children of the parties, and that there was certain community property in the territory of Wyoming worth about $10,000, and also certain personal property in California worth $7,100, and certain described real property here belonging to the community. She prayed for a divorce, the custody of the children, and that the court award to her all the said community property, real and personal, in California. The defendant, who then lived in Wyoming territory, was served by publication, and made default. The court entered a decree on September 11, 1890, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. There was nothing in either the complaint or the judgment about alimony. By the judgment the property prayed for in the complaint was awarded to plaintiff, but it contained nothing more about property, money, or property rights of any kind. The judgment has never been appealed from, or in any way disturbed. On January 20, 1892,—more than 14 months after the judgment,—plaintiff filed a petition entitled in said divorce suit, in which, after alleging certain property and income of defendant, she averred that she was in indigent circumstances, and unable to support herself and said minor children, and that "the sum of $250 is a reasonable sum per month to be allowed plaintiff to support herself, and support and educate her said minor children." She then prays that, in addition to counsel fees, defendant "pay to plaintiff such further sum as to this court may seem just for support of plaintiff and said minor children," and that "said alimony be made permanent." The defendant demurred to the petition upon the ground, among others, of want of jurisdiction. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered. His answer was stricken out for reasons not necessary to be here noticed. The court made findings reciting the history of the divorce, and declaring that defendant had certain property and income, that plaintiff had two minor children dependent upon her, and that she "has not separate property, nor any property, sufficient to maintain herself and said minor children." Whereupon, the court made an order "that defendant pay to plaintiff the sum of one hundred dollars per month on the 20th day of each and every month, commencing on the 20th day of January, 1892, and the defendant do continue to pay said sum to the plaintiff on the 20th day of each and every month thereafter until the further order of this court." From this order, defendant appeals.

We are satisfied that the court had not jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. A judgment in a divorce suit, settling the property rights of the parties, after the time for appealing therefrom has expired, is as final as any other kind of a judgment, except so far as the power to modify it is given by statutory provision. Of course, when we speak of a "final judgment," we mean one which does not upon its face reserve jurisdiction (when that can be done) to make a supplemental decree, in which case it is not final. In the case at bar there was no such reservation. It was final in form and substance. And there is no statutory provision giving jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. Section 137, Civ. Code, provides that "while an action for divorce is pending" the court may require the husband to pay, as alimony, money necessary to enable the wife to support herself and children, and prosecute or defend the action. Section 139 provides that, where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children, and make a suitable allowance for the support of the wife, and that "the court may from time to time modify its orders in these respects." But the latter section clearly contemplates that the right to alimony, as well as other financial and property rights, shall have been presented and litigated in the action for divorce, and established by the judgment; and the provision is that, where the right to alimony has been thus established, the amount may be changed by a modification of the order. But in the case at bar there was nothing to "modify." After the judgment granting the divorce the plaintiff was no longer the wife of the defendant, and he owed her no longer any marital duty. From that time she could enforce against him no obligation not imposed by the court at the time of the judgment. In the case at bar the judgment became final without any award of alimony, and of course the court could not afterwards "modify" what never existed. In Stewart on Marriage and Divorce (section 366), the authorities are correctly summed up in this language: "When the court has allowed the suit to be dismissed, or has finally entered the decree, it has no further jurisdiction over the parties or the subject-matter, except so far as this is reserved by itself or by statute." And in section 376 the author further says: "But a decree of divorce a vinculo is final, and the jurisdiction of the court over the parties is, after the expiration of the term, at an end; and just as there can be no grant of alimony after such a divorce, so there can be no change in the award of alimony, unless the right to make such a change is reserved by the court in its decree, as it may be, or is given by statute, as it often is." See, also, Kamp v. Kamp, 59 N. Y. 212, and Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 22. In the cases cited by respondent the right to alimony had been established in the final decree, or the disposition of the question of alimony had been expressly reserved for further consideration. Our conclusion is that the court below had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from, and that the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained. It is not necessary here to determine what order the court might make "after judgment," under section 138 of the Civil Code, with respect to the "custody, care and education of the children of the marriage." The order under review is for alimony for the wife, and for her support, and its character is not changed by the mention of the children. The order appealed from is reversed.

GRUSS v. ROBERTSON et al. (No. 18,283.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL.

The granting a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence is discretionary with the trial court.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action by Joseph Gruss against Martha Robertson and others. From an order granting a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Goodwin & Goodwin, for appellants. C. E. McLaughlin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order granting the plaintiff a new trial upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence, and the only question is, did the court abuse its discretion in making the order? It is true that "applications for new trials upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence must be looked upon with suspicion and disfavor, because the temptation to make a favorable showing after having sustained a defeat is great." Arnold v. Skaggs, 35 Cal. 684. But it is also true that "applications on this ground are addressed to the discretion of the court below, and the action of the court below will not be disturbed, except for an abuse of discretion, the presumption being that the discretion was properly exercised." Hayne, New Trial & App. § 87; People v. Sutton, 73 Cal. 248, 15 Pac. 86; People v. Urquidas, 96 Cal. 240, 31 Pac. 52. At the hearing of the motion, affidavits were read by both sides, and it must be presumed that they were properly looked upon and considered by the court. They were conflicting as to some of the facts stated, but it was the province of that court to determine on which side was the truth. Assuming, therefore, as we must, that the facts stated in the plaintiff's affidavits were true, we think there was a sufficient showing to meet the requirements of the law in such cases, and to justify the order. At any rate, we cannot say that the action of the court was an abuse of its discretion. The order appealed from is affirmed.

RAYMOND v. GLOVER et al. (No. 19,335.)[1]

MORTGAGE FOR PURCHASE MONEY—VALIDITY—DELIVERY TO UNAUTHORIZED PARTY—EFFECT—EXTINCTION OF VENDOR'S LIEN.

1. Where an agent for the sale of land, intrusted with a deed thereof, through the negligence of the vendee, who knew that he was authorized to deliver the deed only after a purchase-money note and mortgage were executed to the vendor, fraudulently took the note and mortgage in his own name, there was no valid delivery, and the vendor was entitled to a lien for the price, as against an innocent purchaser of the mortgage.

2. Where a vendee signs a purchase-money mortgage, payable to the vendor's agent, under the belief that it is payable to the vendor, after having ample opportunity to examine it, he cannot contest its validity as against an innocent purchaser.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Ellen D. Raymond against George W. Glover, Sarah J. Glover, George Munroe, and the German-American Savings Bank to establish a vendor's lien. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant bank appeals, and, by a cross bill, seeks to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed and remanded.

Walter Bordwell and Chapman & Hendricks, for appellant. Lee & Scott and Wilson & Lamme, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from the judgment, with a bill of exceptions. The complaint, as amended, shows: That on the 1st day of July, 1891, plaintiff owned a certain tract of land in the county of Los Angeles, and on that day entered into an agreement with the defendant George W. Glover to sell to him said tract of land for $1,800, of which sum $500 was to be paid in cash, and $1,300 to be secured by mortgage on the place, payable in three years, with interest at 9 per cent. per annum. That plaintiff was absent from the state, and the sale was negotiated by her through defendant George Munroe. That afterwards, to wit, January 22, 1892, plaintiff executed and forwarded to said Munroe a deed duly signed and acknowledged, conveying said property to George W. Glover and Sarah J. Glover, his wife, with instructions to deliver the same to George W. Glover upon receiving the promissory note of said Glover and wife, secured by mortgage as provided in said agreement, and the payment of $500 cash. That said Munroe received the deed, and, in violation of the instructions to him, gave into the possession of defendant George W. Glover said deed without receiving the said promissory note or mortgage, and said Glover caused the deed to be recorded in the recorder's office of Los Angeles county. Though said Glovers paid the said sum of $500, they wholly failed to execute said note and mortgage, or pay the said sum of $1,300 or any part thereof, and the same is still unpaid. That said Munroe, at the time he gave said deed into the possession of said Glover, fraudulently prepared a note and mortgage for $1,300, running and payable to himself, and induced said Glovers to execute the same under the belief that plaintiff was named in said note and mortgage as payee. That the defendant the German-American Savings Bank afterwards caused said mortgage to be recorded, claiming to be the assignee thereof. That said note and mortgage were executed and delivered without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff. That she had no knowledge of such facts until after the pretended assignment to the defendant bank. That said note and mortgage were without consideration other than as herein set forth, and were taken by said Munroe in violation of his duty, and in fraud of plaintiff's rights. That at the time of the delivery to said George W. Glover of said deed, and the execution and delivery to him of said note and mortgage, said Glover had full notice of the agency of said Munroe, and that said Munroe had no right or authority to take such note and mortgage. That the sole consideration for the note and mortgage was the conveyance, and said Munroe had no authority to take them otherwise than in the name of plaintiff, of which facts the bank had full notice. She asks the court to decree that the note and mortgage were accepted, taken, and held by Munroe as her trustee, and are now held by the bank as her trustee, or that she has a vendor's lien upon the premises for $1,300 and interest, and such other relief as may be equitable. The appellant, the bank, answered, denying all the allegations in the complaint, and averring an assignment to itself for a valuable consideration and without notice. Appellant also filed a cross complaint, in which it seeks to foreclose the mortgage. To this cross complaint the Glovers answer, averring that the note and mortgage were wholly without consideration and were procured by fraud. They also filed a cross complaint, in which they set out the alleged fraud and want of consideration, and ask to have the note and mortgage declared void. To this cross complaint the appellant answered, denying the fraud, and pleading want of notice, and its purchase for a valuable consideration.

[1] For separate opinion, see 37 Pac. 918.

The court found the sale of the land as averred by the plaintiff; that plaintiff was a nonresident; that she signed and acknowledged the deed, and sent the same to Munroe with the instructions averred; that Munroe handed the deed to Glover without taking his note or mortgage as he was instructed to do; that Munroe received the said $500 from Glover, but, instead of taking the note and mortgage payable to plaintiff, fraudulently prepared a note and mortgage for the same amount payable to himself, and, with intent to deceive said Glovers, represented to them that the note and mortgage were made in favor of plaintiff, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and pretended to read the papers to the Glovers, but fraudulently read the name of plaintiff as payee; that, relying upon the representations and deceived by the false practices, the Glovers executed the note and mortgage fraudulently prepared by Munroe, believing that they were payable to plaintiff and in accordance with their agreement; that the note and mortgage were so executed without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, who did not know of the fraud until after the assignment to the bank.

The note and mortgage were without consideration, and were taken by Munroe in violation of his duty, and in fraud of the rights of plaintiff. At the time of the execution of said note and mortgage, said Glovers well knew that Munroe had no authority to accept such a note and mortgage, or any note or mortgage in his own name. Afterwards, on the 23d of February, 1892, said Munroe assigned the note and mortgage to defendant bank as security for the payment of a note of $1,000 then borrowed by Munroe from the bank. Prior to receiving said assignment and to the loaning of said money by the bank, its cashier, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the property, and also whether said Glovers had any set-off or other defense to the note and mortgage, went with Munroe to the residence of George W. Glover, and thereupon said Munroe, without the hearing of the cashier, stated to Glover that he (Munroe) had bought the note and mortgage from plaintiff. Thereupon, said cashier told said Glover that the bank was about to loan to Munroe $1,000 upon the note and mortgage which he and Mrs. Glover had given, and asked how much he was owing on it, and if it was all right, to which Glover replied that $1,300 was due on the mortgage, and it was all right. Glover did not then know that Munroe had been named in the note and mortgage as payee, but believed that the note and mortgage had been purchased by Munroe. The representation was made without any intent to mislead the bank, and in the honest belief that Munroe had bought the note, and had the right to hypothecate it. The court failed to find whether the bank loaned the money to Munroe, and took the assignment in good faith, without notice of plaintiff's equities. The evidence shows, however, without contradiction, that the appellant acted in entire good faith, without knowledge that plaintiff had any claim to the debt, or that Munroe had ever been her agent, or that she had been the owner of the land.

The first question which presents itself is whether there was a valid delivery of the deed. There was an agreement in writing, in which the terms of the sale were fully stated. The Glovers, therefore, knew perfectly well that the deed was not to be delivered until the note and mortgage were executed to plaintiff. Munroe was a special agent, and the possession of the deed under the circumstances had no tendency to show ostensible authority. The delivery of the deed was therefore in violation of the power of the agent. Schultz v. McLean, 93 Cal. 329, 28 Pac. 1053, is not opposed to this conclusion. In that case the purchaser did not know of any conditions in regard to the delivery of the deed, other than those with which he had complied. He had made an offer for the land. The agent of the grantors notified him of the acceptance of his offer. As a matter of fact, according to the finding, the grantees did not accept the offer, but asked further consideration. The agent falsely told the purchaser that his offer was accepted, and the grantors that their counter offer was accepted. The deed was then passed, each party believing upon terms he had proposed. The misunderstanding was through the fraud of plaintiff's agent. The vendors and vendee met several times during the negotiations. It was held that the agent was enabled to accomplish the fraud in consequence of the negligence of the grantors. They were therefore compelled to bear the loss. Plaintiff here has been guilty of no neglect. Nor can I see how the case differs as to the appellant. The claim is that because Munroe was the agent of plaintiff, and was placed in a position where he could consummate the fraud because of such agency, therefore plaintiff must bear the loss. There may be language in some of the cases which would sanction this broad statement of the rule. The rule, however, is not peculiar to the law of agency, but is general. Generally, it is stated as in our Code: "Where one of two innocent parties must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer." Civ. Code, § 3543. The statement is slightly self-contradictory, but really, I think, states the true rule. Beyond this, I see no justice in it. The fact that one has been placed by my act in a position which will enable him to defraud another does not make me liable,—not even if I have trusted a dishonest man, and thereby raised his credit. If I lend my horse to one who proves to be a rogue, and he, taking advantage of his possession, sells the horse, the purchaser cannot hold me for it. But it was not even the trust reposed in Munroe by plaintiff that placed in his hands the instrument which enabled him to defraud appellant. Her instructions were explicit, and were well known to the only parties with whom he was authorized to deal. Whatever, therefore, may be the rights of the bank, as against Glover, I think it plain that plaintiff is entitled to the first lien upon the property to secure her debt of $1,300.

But the case is very different between Glover and the bank, assuming, as we must, that the bank took the security without notice. The note was nonnegotiable, and naturally the obligor could interpose any defense against a purchaser which he had against the payee named. But the bank, before taking the security, sent its agent to Glover, and, after informing him of the contemplated loan, inquired if he had any defense, and was informed by Glover that he had none. It is found that Glover did not then know that the note had been originally given to Munroe, but believed that plaintiff had assigned it to Munroe. Even had such been the fact, it was a lack of diligence to assure the bank that Munroe's title was all right upon Munroe's word that he had bought the note. But there was gross negligence in the execution of the note. I do not mean to say that Glover could not have defended against Munroe, though some of the cases seem to go that far. But it is the precise case provided for in the maxim quoted,—that, when one of two innocent men must suffer, he shall bear the loss whose negligence has occasioned it. There would be very little use in having written instruments if there were no presumption that when one signs such he does so knowing what he is signing. Men do not usually execute such papers until they have carefully examined them. It must be, therefore, that to execute them without such care is negligence. The business of the world could hardly be carried on upon any other hypothesis. There was no fiduciary relation between Munroe and Glover. On the contrary, their interests were adverse. It appears further that Munroe practiced no arts to induce Glover to sign without reading. The mortgage and note were filled out at Glover's house, and in his presence. The note was a printed form, and with only a few blanks to fill, one of which necessarily was the name of the payee. When they were finished and ready to sign, Munroe did not volunteer to read them, but handed them to Glover and requested him to read them. Glover said his eyes were bad, and requested Munroe to do so. It is hard to believe, under such circumstances, that Munroe contemplated any such deceit as the court finds. The notary, the only really disinterested witness, testified that the note and mortgage were correctly read. There was, however, conflicting testimony, and the court finds that they were incorrectly read. But Glover had no right to trust his adversary, and, when the question is whether he or an innocent party must suffer for his negligence, he must bear the loss. Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558; Blaisdell v. Leach (Cal.) 35 Pac. 1019; Plummer v. Bank, 90 Ind. 386; 2 Herm. Estop. § 1004.

As there is no finding upon the question raised as to the good faith and want of notice of the bank, the case should be remanded, with directions to find whether or not the bank took the note as security without notice of the facts tending to show its invalidity. This fact may be found upon the evidence already taken, with such further evidence upon that subject as the parties may see fit to submit. If the court finds for the appellant upon that subject, the plaintiff should be allowed a preferred lien for $1,300 and interest, as provided in the contract of sale, and the bank should be allowed to retain the lien of its mortgage, subject to plaintiff's lien, to the extent of its debt against Munroe.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the cause is remanded, with directions to find whether or not the bank took the note as security without notice of the facts tending tc show its invalidity. This fact may be found upon the evidence already taken, with such further evidence upon that subject as the parties may see fit to submit. If the court finds for the appellant upon that subject, the plaintiff should be allowed a preferred lien for $1,300 and interest, as provided in the contract of sale, and the bank should be allowed to retain the lien of its mortgage, subject to plaintiff's lien, to the extent of its debt against Munroe.

PALMER et al. v. LAVIGNE et ux. (No. 19,394.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN — FOR WHAT GIVEN — CLAIM — SUFFICIENCY — PLEADING.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that all persons and laborers of every class performing labor on the construction, alteration or repair of any building shall have a lien therefor, includes work done in moving a building.

2. Where a statute requires a lien claim to state "the name of the owner or reputed owner if known," a claim which states that it was to be paid by "J. L., who was and still is the reputed owner" of the land, and that J. L. and M. L. are the reputed owners of the building on which the claim rests, is sufficient.

3. Where copy of a lien claim made part of a complaint on foreclosure states that the contract was made with the wife, and the complaint itself states that the claimant "entered into a contract with the defendants," i. e. the wife and the husband, the complaint is demurrable as ambiguous and uncertain.

4. When the claim and notice of lien stated that the contract on which a lien is based was made with the wife, and the complaint alleges that it was made with both husband and wife, the variance is fatal to the admission of the lien claim and notice in evidence.

5. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, which provides that "every building constructed on any land with the knowledge of the owner shall be held constructed at his instance and subject to liens unless such owner within three days posts a notice disclaiming responsibility," liens may be created on a homestead without the joint action of husband and wife.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by J. D. Palmer and another against John E. Lavigne and Mary C. Lavigne to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal from an order denying a new trial. Reversed.

Aitken & Smith, for appellants. Works & Works, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien upon a dwelling house and the land adjacent thereto, taken under the Code of Civil Procedure, to secure the sum of $60, due the plaintiffs as copartners and as original contractors for moving the house upon which the lien is claimed from San Diego to the ranch described in the complain. Plaintiffs had judgment of foreclosure, from which judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

The defendants are husband and wife, and the real estate upon which the lien was foreclosed is the homestead of the defendants under the laws of the state of California. Defendants filed separate demurrers to the amended complaint, differing in some respects, but each averring that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The first point made by appellants is that, under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiffs were not entitled to a lien for moving a building. Their contention is that the section specified only gives such lien for labor performed or materials furnished in the construction, alteration, or repair, either in whole or in part, of a building, and that labor performed in removing a building from one point to another is not within the scope or intent of the statute. So much of section 1183 as is essential to the question is as follows: "All persons and laborers of every class performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, alteration, addition to or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building * * * shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials." We regard the construction of appellants as being erroneous. "All persons and laborers of every class performing labor upon," etc. Manifestly the preposition "upon" refers to and has for its objective the noun "building," and is to be read as though the word "building," with its qualifying word "any," followed immediately after the word "upon." The lien to material men is only given to those who furnish materials to be used in the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair of, the building, etc.; that to laborers is given to all who perform labor upon it, whether technically coming within the definition of construction, alteration, etc., or not. The case of Trask v. Searle, 121 Mass. 229, cited and relied upon by appellants, is not in point, for the reason that the statute of Massachusetts varies from our own. It is in part as follows: "Any person to whom a debt is due for labor performed or furnished, or for materials furnished and actually used in the erection, alteration or repair of any building or structure upon real estate," etc. As will be observed, there the lien for labor is given for those who have performed or furnished labor in the erection, alteration, or repair of the building, while our statute gives a lien to all laborers who have performed labor upon the building, etc. It follows that the point is not well taken.

The next point is that there is no sufficient statement in the lien which is attached to the complaint of the ownership or reputed ownership of the defendants in the property sought to be foreclosed. The language of the lien is, after stating the manner and time of payment, the last of which, it is averred, was to be paid out of the wages of "John Lavigne, her husband, who was, and still is, the reputed owner of the said Lavigne ranch." And as to the building which was moved upon the ranch, it is averred the defendants, Mary C. and John E. Lavigne, are the reputed owners. This was sufficient. The statute only requires the claim of lien to state "the name of the owner or reputed owner if known," which was done.

The demurrer of defendant Mary C. Lavigne to the amended complaint specifies that said complaint is ambiguous, in that it cannot be determined therefrom whether the contract alleged in the complaint "to have been entered into by the plaintiffs and the defendants, or one of them, was made by the defendant Mary C. Lavigne, or by the defendant John E. Lavigne, or both;" that it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether plaintiffs seek to hold this defendant under an alleged contract made with her, or on account of some interest which she holds in the land. There are also separate specifications of uncertainty, and that it is unintelligible, for the same causes set out under the head of ambiguity. The statement in the claim of lien attached to and made a part of the complaint is that the contract was made with Mary C. Lavigne, and that the "contract was made with the full knowledge and consent of John E. Lavigne, and the work was carried on with his full acquiescence." The allegation of the complaint is that plaintiffs "made and entered into a contract with defendants," etc. The defendants are John E. Lavigne and Mary C. Lavigne. It has been said that when the allegations of a complaint are inconsistent with an exhibit attached, demurrer for ambiguity and uncertainty is well taken. Mendocino Co. v. Morris, 32 Cal. 145; Frazer v. Barlow, 63 Cal. 71; Malone v. Gravel Co., 76 Cal. 578, 18 Pac. 772; Water Co. v. Baker, 95 Cal. 268, 30 Pac. 537. The fact that a contract was made with Mary C. Lavigne, and that John E. Lavigne had knowledge of it, consented thereto, and acquiesced in the work under it, did not make it his contract. The defendant Mary C. Lavigne had a right to know whether it was sought to charge her upon a contract made with her individually, or upon a joint contract entered into with her and the other defendant. Her personal liability, in the one case, for any residue after exhausting the property covered by the lien, would be quite different from that in the other. We think the complaint was both ambiguous and uncertain. The demurrer, having specifically and separately stated these causes of demurrer, and the reasons therefor, should have been sustained, and the order overruling it was erroneous.

There is nothing in the point made by appellants that a mechanic's lien cannot be created upon the homestead, except by the joint action of the husband and wife. See section 1192, Code Civ. Proc. Walsh v. McMenomy, 74 Cal. 356, 16 Pac. 17, was decided upon a construction of section 1241 of the Civil Code, as it stood prior to the amendment of March 9, 1887, and has no application to the law as it at present exists. A homestead is free from forced sale, except as provided by the statute. Among the cases in which it may be sold under execution, precisely as though it was not impressed with the homestead character, are those under judgments obtained upon debts secured by "mechanics', contractors', subcontractors,' artisans', architects', builders', laborers' of every class, material men's, or vendors' liens on the premises." The claim and notice of lien was offered in evidence, and objected to, among other things, upon the ground of variance for like reasons with those stated in the demurrer. The objection was overruled, and defendants excepted. The variance was fatal. Malone v. Gravel Co., at page 581, 76 Cal., and page 772, 18 Pac.; Reed v. Norton, 90 Cal. 592, 26 Pac. 767, and 27 Pac. 426; Cox v. McLaughlin, 63 Cal. 207. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to sustain the demurrer of Mary C. Lavigne to the amended complaint.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

Order striking out a portion of a former opinion. 37 Pac. 514.

PER CURIAM. It appearing to the court that the question discussed in the opinion in the above case as to the validity of the tax levied by the board of directors of the irrigation district is not necessarily involved in the disposition of the appeal upon its merits, it is hereby ordered that such portion of the opinion of the court as contains a discussion of the aforesaid question be, and the same is, stricken therefrom. It is further ordered that the word "judgment" in the concluding sentence of said opinion be stricken out, and the word "order" inserted instead thereof.

BEAN v. STONEMAN et al. (No. 19,396.)

IRRIGATION—CONTRACT TO FURNISH WATER—CONSTRUCTION — COVENANTS RUNNING WITH THE LAND.

1. A grantor conveyed a portion of a tract of land, and also conveyed to the grantee a certain proportion of all the water rising on the tract, and covenanted to suffer the water to flow to the grantee's line through a trench which the grantor was at the time using. There was no way provided for measuring the water at the grantee's line, but it was to be taken from a reservoir on the grantor's land, being permitted to flow to the grantee in an "augmented head" once in 10 days. Held, that the place of delivery of the water was at the reservoir, and not at the grantee's line, he having an easement in the trench for that purpose.

2. On abandonment of the trench by the grantor it was the duty of the grantee to keep it in repair.

3. The "augmented head" provided for must be limited to the capacity of the trench at the reservoir, and any change in the delivery of the water from the reservoir, provided the discharge still equaled the full capacity of the trench at the reservoir, was permissible.

4. The covenant for the delivery of the water was a covenant running with the land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by C. F. Bean against Mary O. H. Stoneman and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. Brunson, for appellants. Sheldon Borden and Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This is an action to recover damages for a failure to furnish water for irrigation, whereby it is alleged the orange and other trees, corn, and vegetables of the plaintiff were injured or destroyed. A jury trial was had, and resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for the sum of $4,580. Defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

In 1873 the defendant George Stoneman was the owner of a ranch then and now known as the "Stoneman Ranch," upon a portion of which were springs and water sources, the waters from which were collected in a reservoir constructed upon the ranch, and from which the water, or a portion of it, was conducted through a ditch for the purposes of irrigation. In March of that year he sold and conveyed to Barrows and Furrey 18 acres of land, part of said Stoneman tract, together with a certain portion of the waters rising upon the unsold part of the ranch. The covenant contained in the deed relating to the water right is as follows: "And the party of the first part, for the consideration aforesaid, hereby conveys, bargains, and grants, and agrees to deliver and suffer to flow, to the parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns of said above-conveyed lands, an amount of water equal to two-fortieths (2-40) of all the waters rising upon the lands of the party of the first part, so far as such waters can be brought to the northern line of the above-conveyed lands by the present ditch, or by such further ditch or flume as the party of the first part may hereafter construct; said amount of water to be delivered so that the parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns, shall, if by them required, have water for irrigation, as often at least as once in every ten days: provided, that in lieu and stead of receiving such amount and proportion of water by the ditch or flume of the party of the first part, the right is hereby granted to the parties of the second part, at their option, to take such quantity and proportion of water from the reservoir about to be constructed by said Stoneman in front of his house, and to conduct the same thence onto the above-conveyed lands by an underground pipe through the intervening lands of the party of the first part, at the expense of the parties of the second part, and in a careful manner, and without injury to trees, vines, and other improvements on said intervening lands; and for the purpose of the laying of said pipe the right of way and entry is hereby granted."

At the date of this conveyance the parcel sold was not improved, but the ditch above mentioned was constructed to the land sold, and was used for irrigating other lands of the grantor; the length of the ditch, or distance from the reservoir to the parcel sold, being about one mile and a quarter. The plaintiff became the owner of the 18 acres so conveyed to Barrows and Furrey, in June, 1887, together with said water right. Prior to 1891 the water was discharged from the reservoir into the ditch through a square, wooden box or flume, which passed through the embankment or dam near the bottom of the reservoir, and which was closed by a gate; the dimensions of the box being about 14x16 inches. In the winter of 1890-91, a portion of the dam was washed out, when the box was found to be decayed, and was replaced with an eight-inch steel pipe. From 1873 to 1891, whenever the lot now owned by plaintiff required irrigation, the water was turned into the ditch in what is termed an "augmented head;" that is, the two-fortieths to which the lot was entitled did not flow into the ditch continuously, but was permitted to accumulate until needed, when it would be discharged in a volume approximating the capacity of the ditch. The evidence shows quite clearly that, if the water to which plaintiff is entitled were permitted to flow continuously into the ditch, it would be absorbed by the ditch, and no part of it would reach plaintiff's land. Prior to 1890, Mrs. Stoneman, who succeeded to the unsold portions of the ranch, as well as her husband before the conveyance to her, irrigated a vineyard upon the ranch, containing from 120 to 140 acres, through the same ditch; but in 1890 the vineyard was destroyed by a disease which attacked the vines, and after that the defendants used no water through that ditch, their orange orchard and ornamental grounds being irrigated through another channel from the same reservoir. Mr. Graves owns a place in the vicinity of plaintiff's lot, and he also obtained water for irrigation from defendant's reservoir, but his water was conveyed through an iron pipe. In 1894, Mr. Hall, who then owned the lot now owned by plaintiff, and a Mr. Anderson, who owned land in that vicinity, were permitted to tap Mr. Graves' pipe, and obtain water for irrigation through it. Mr. Hall used that source entirely until he sold to plaintiff, and the plaintiff thereafter used it almost exclusively until 1890, when the license was revoked. From these causes, together with the destruction of defendants' vineyard, the ditch was little used in 1890, and it was not attempted to be used in 1891, until on or about the 4th of June, when the plaintiff undertook to obtain water through it to irrigate his land. Shortly before this attempt he applied to Mrs. Stoneman to clean out and repair the ditch, which she declined to do, and the plaintiff thereupon did that work. Upon turning the water into the ditch the first day, the water flowed down the ditch about halfway to plaintiff's land. At the next effort a little water reached the plaintiff towards night, and another attempt brought the water a little earlier, but not in sufficient quantity to do much good, the greater part of it being taken up by the ditch. The failure to obtain sufficient water is attributed by plaintiff to the insufficient size of the pipe by which the water is discharged from the reservoir into the ditch, and to a perforated hood placed over the upper end of it, and a hydrant through which it is discharged at the lower end. The quantity of water rising upon the ranch and flowing into the reservoir was found by measurement to be 38 miners' inches.

The principal question in the case involves the construction of the covenant in the deed from Stoneman to Barrows and Furrey, hereinbefore quoted, and is directly presented by the following instruction given to the jury: "By the deed of George Stoneman to Barrows and Furrey, said Stoneman agreed to deliver the water at the northern line of the 18-acre tract, as far as said water could be brought to that point by means of the ditch then extending to said land. By this agreement it is incumbent on said Stoneman and his successors to keep said ditch in reasonably good repair." We think the court erred in this instruction as to the place where the water is to be delivered, and as to the obligation to keep the ditch in repair, though it is conceded that the same duty and liability which rested upon George Stoneman now rest upon Mrs. Stoneman, who has succeeded to his estate by a subsequent grant, and that appellants' contention that the covenant was personal, and did not run with the land, and become obligatory upon Mrs. Stoneman, cannot be sustained. The quantity of water granted by the deed is two-fortieths of all the water rising upon the ranch, and no more. The water so granted was intended to be taken, and, except as to the water procured through the pipe of Mr. Graves, had been taken, through the ditch above mentioned. The two-fortieths of the 38 inches rising above the reservoir is a fraction less than 2 inches; and, as a loss is necessarily sustained in conveying water through an open ditch, if defendant is required to deliver that quantity at the north line of plaintiff's land, it is evident that a greater proportion than two-fortieths must be used. What such excess must be depends upon the character of the soil or earth in which the ditch is constructed, the care taken in its preservation, and the frequency or constancy of its use. The testimony of Mr. Purcell was to the effect that in a ditch kept in the best condition the loss was equal to about 25 per cent.; while the effort of plaintiff to procure water through this ditch in June, 1891, showed almost an entire loss. In this connection it may be noticed that the grant, instead of designating the quantity of water in inches, specifies the proportion of the water rising on the ranch, and thus strongly suggests, if it does not positively show, that the water was apportioned to the entire ranch, each parcel as sold taking only its proportion; and, if so, the loss in conveying the water to the different portions must be borne by such portions, else the loss must be borne by the defendants, leaving a part of the land remaining in their ownership without water,—a result that could not have been contemplated or intended. This, we think, is conclusive of the quantity to be delivered, there being nothing in the language of the grant inconsistent with it. As to the place of delivery it also has a material bearing. It will be observed that the grant does not expressly state where it is to be delivered, nor how the quantity is to be ascertained. No means or mode of measurement was provided at the north line of plaintiff's land, nor was any measurement at that place ever used, so far as the record shows. It was to be taken from the reservoir. At that place the capacity of the reservoir, the quantity of water flowing, and the gate by which it was discharged, each or all together, furnished at least an approximate mode of ascertaining the quantity, and, in the absence of an express agreement or manifest intention to the contrary, it must be held to be the place of delivery. The place of delivery being at the reservoir, the covenant was that Stoneman would "suffer to flow to the parties of the second part * * * an amount of water equal to two-fortieths, * * * so far as such waters can be brought to the northern line * * * by the present ditch, or by such further ditch as the party of the first part may hereafter construct." The place of the sale and delivery of the water being at the reservoir, here was the grant of an easement for its conveyance to plaintiff's land, through which the grantor covenanted he would "suffer the water to flow" over his intervening land. The grantee or owner of the easement is bound to keep it in repair, and this applies as well to water ditches as to private ways. Quinlan v. Noble, 75 Cal. 250, 17 Pac. 69; Durfee v. Garvey, 78 Cal. 546, 21 Pac. 302. In Prescott v. Williams, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 429, a case cited in Durfee v. Garvey, supra, it was said: "The duty of making repairs, and the labor necessary for keeping the water course in a state fit for use, rests wholly upon him who claims an easement on his neighbor's land; and, as a general rule, easements impose no obligation upon those whose lands are thus placed in servitude to do anything." See, also, Godd. Easem. pp. 285, 443. The owner of the servient estate can do no voluntary act to destroy or impair the easement, and hence the grant would not permit the destruction of the ditch then in existence, unless another should be provided, or the grantee should obtain the water from the proposed new reservoir, by a pipe to be laid at the grantee's expense. The fact that the grantor was using this ditch at the date of the grant could not of itself impose upon him the obligation to always continue its use, and the grant contained no express covenant that he would do so, or that he would keep the ditch in repair.

As to the change made by defendant from the wooden flume to the steel pipe, the court correctly charged the jury that she was not bound to maintain precisely the same system of discharging the water from the reservoir; but, in the view we have taken as to the place of delivery, the latter part of the instruction should be modified. The testimony of the engineer who made the change was that the area of the pipe is 50¼ square inches; that the former dam was low, and at the time the pipe was put in the dam was raised "pretty near five feet;" and that, with a full reservoir, the outlet end of the pipe would discharge 206 miners' inches, and that the capacity of the ditch is about 150 miners' inches, and that the pipe would carry the full flow of the water (that is, the full flow of the water as it rose in the cañon) when the pipe was just covered, and, as the head was raised, the discharge would be increased. Whatever an "augmented head" or an "augmented flow" may be held to be, as applied to this case, we think that it must at least be limited by the capacity of the ditch; and by that we mean the capacity of the ditch to carry the water at the upper part of it, and before it is diminished by seepage. If, therefore, the steel pipe which replaced the wooden flume is capable of supplying the capacity of the ditch at or near the head, certainly no more can be required of the defendants; and the duty rests upon the plaintiff to put and keep the ditch in such condition that it will convey the water his needs require, or adopt some other mode of conveying it. A simple calculation will show the quantity of water to which the plaintiff is entitled. The deed requires that he shall have it at least once in every 10 days. The entire flow is 38 inches. If the entire flow for 10 days were accumulated, it would equal 380 inches for 1 day. The two-fortieths, or one-twentieth, of that is 19 inches constant flow for 24 hours, to which quantity the plaintiff is entitled; or, if delivered in 12 hours, it would be 38 inches, or the natural flow of the water rising in the cañon for 12 hours in each 10 days.

Whether the hydrant attached to the lower end of the pipe is of sufficient capacity to discharge that quantity of water in 12 hours or less, is a question of fact which ought to be capable of exact ascertainment. The testimony of Mr. Purcell, the engineer who put in the pipe and hydrant, based upon calculation, and not upon actual measurement of the water discharged, would tend to show that the discharge, when the reservoir was full, was largely in excess of 38 miners' inches, and equal to the capacity of the ditch; while the plaintiff contends that the quantity discharged was much less than formerly. While the manner in which the water was formerly delivered may be conclusive of the question as to plaintiff's right to receive the water in an augmented head instead of a continuous flow of two-fortieths, it is not conclusive of the extent of the augmented flow; but the covenant must have a reasonable construction, since the plaintiff's right is not based upon prescription, but upon a written contract, which requires the water to be delivered "at least once in ten days;" but, while the covenant does fix a limit to the quantity that can be used every 10 days, it does not determine, in terms, whether that quantity shall be discharged in 24 hours, or in 12, or in any less number of hours. All that can be said, as an abstract proposition of law, is that it should be discharged in such volume that, the ditch being in good condition, it will give the plaintiff a reasonable use of the water; not, however, in such volume as a larger ditch would carry, nor such as might be used by a large force of men distributing it, nor yet requiring a larger flow to compensate for the loss of water by reason of the ditch not being in proper condition. The evidence shows, we think, that the ditch, at the times the plaintiff attempted to use it, was in bad condition; and, if the failure to obtain sufficient water for irrigation was fairly attributable to that cause, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The amendment to the complaint was within the discretion of the court, and did not prejudice the defendants, and their motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled, inasmuch as there was evidence tending to show that the means of discharging the water from the reservoir into the ditch was inadequate. The plaintiff was not required to elect upon which count he would proceed, and the ruling of the court thereon was right, and evidence was properly received under paragraph 6 of the complaint.

The remaining specifications of error, so far as the same are important or likely to arise upon a new trial, are sufficiently noticed and controlled by the general discussion of the controlling questions in the case. We think the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PERKINS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF FRESNO COUNTY. (No. 15,711.)

APPEAL FROM JUSTICE—FILING OF BOND.

An appeal will not be dismissed because the bond was not filed within 30 days after the rendition of the judgment by a justice of the peace, if the bond was delivered and left at the office of the justice, but was not received or marked "Filed" by him until 2 days after the 30 days.

In bank.

Petition by one Perkins for a writ of prohibition against the superior court of Fresno county to prevent proceedings on appeal. Writ denied.

Warlow & Hargrove and Wm. Grant, for petitioner. Miles Wallace, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The petitioner moved the superior court to dismiss the appeal from a judgment rendered in his favor by a justice of the peace. The ground of the motion was that the undertaking on appeal had not been filed within 30 days after rendition and entry of the judgment. The superior court denied the motion, and this is a petition for a writ to prohibit further proceedings upon the appeal. It appears from the allegations of the petition that ample evidence was adduced at the hearing of the motion to warrant the superior court in finding that the undertaking was delivered and left at the office of the justice of the peace within the 30 days, and that it was not received by him, or marked "Filed," until two days after that time because of his absence from his office and from the county. If this was the case the superior court has jurisdiction of the appeal. Writ denied.

SAN LUIS OBISPO COUNTY v. FELTS et al. (No. 19,426.)

POLL TAX — COMPENSATION FOR COLLECTION — RIGHTS OF COUNTY ASSESSOR—COMPENSATION—INCREASE DURING TERM.

1. Const. art. 13, § 12, provides that the state poll tax "shall be paid into the state school fund." Const. art. 9, § 6, provides that the "entire revenue derived from the state school fund shall be applied exclusively to the support of primary and grammar schools." Held, that the word "exclusively" confines the use of school funds to the grammar and primary schools, to the exclusion of other schools mentioned in the same section, and does not forbid the use of any of the poll tax to pay the expenses of its collection.

2. Pol. Code, § 3862, providing that "the assessor for services in the collection of poll taxes shall receive the sum of 15%," and section 1857, providing that no assessor shall receive pay for collecting or handling school money, "provided that said assessor shall receive 15% of the collections by him of poll taxes," are not in conflict with Const. art. 13, § 12, which provides that the poll tax "shall be paid into the state school fund."

3. Act March 31, 1891, § 216, allows county assessors compensation for the collection of poll taxes, and, as the last expression of the legislative will, controls all former legislation on the subject, and renders nugatory the effect of the act of March 10, 1891, so far as it requires the assessor to pay all fees for services to the county treasurer.

4. Pol. Code, § 2652, authorized the levy of a poll tax for road purposes, and allowed the road overseer 15 per cent. for collecting it. St. 1891, p. 478, transferred the duty of collecting the tax to the county assessor. Held, that the latter statute, though passed during the term of office of an assessor, did not conflict with Const. art. 11, § 9, which prohibits any increase of compensation to county officers during their term of office, since it merely allowed the previously established percentage for the collection of poll taxes, and increased the assessor's work in the proportion in which it increased his pay.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by San Luis Obispo county against J. M. Felts and others, sureties on his bond, to recover certain percentages of the poll tax withheld as compensation for collection. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

E. P. Unangst and Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for appellants. F. A. Dorn, for respondent. H. C. Dillon, Dist. Atty., amicus curiae. Dudley & Buck, amicus curiae, for assessors of seven other counties. H. A. Barclay, for Los Angeles assessor.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action brought by the county against the county assessor and his sureties to recover the amount of certain percentages of personal property taxes, and of the state and road poll taxes, claimed and withheld by him as his legal compensation for making the collections. The complaint contains three counts, —the first, for $350, being 6 per cent. of the personal property tax; the second, for $350, being 15 per cent. of the state poll tax; and the third, for $310, being 15 per cent. of the road poll taxes. On the first cause of action the superior court gave judgment for the defendants. On the second and third causes of action the judgment was in favor of the plaintiff, and from this part of the judgment the defendants appeal. In support of their appeal the defendants cite various provisions of the Political Code and the county government law, which clearly authorize the assessor to retain as his compensation for his services 15 per cent. of all poll taxes collected by him; but the respondent contends that, as to the state poll tax, all these provisions are in conflict with the mandate of the constitution which appropriates that tax exclusively to the support of the public schools; and, with respect to the road poll tax, the contention is that no law in existence prior to the election of this assessor gave him the collection of the road poll tax, and to allow him a percentage for collecting it under a law passed subsequent to his election would be to increase his compensation contrary to the inhibition of the constitution against any increase of the compensation of public officers after their election. The first section of the constitution cited by counsel for respondent in support of its contention is section 12 of article 13, which reads as follows: "The legislature shall provide for the levy and collection of an annual poll tax of not less than two dollars on every male inhabitant of this state over twenty-one and under sixty years of age, except paupers, idiots, insane persons, and Indians not taxed. Said tax shall be paid into the state school fund." In connection with this they also cite section 6 of article 9, which reads as follows: "The public school system shall include primary and grammar schools, and such high schools, evening schools, normal schools and technical schools as may be established by the legislature, or by municipal or district authority; but the entire revenue derived from the state school fund and the state school tax shall be applied exclusively to the support of primary and grammar schools."

It is upon the last clause of the latter section that particular reliance is placed, and especially the word "exclusively," therein contained, which, it is contended, clearly evinces an intention on the part of the framers of the constitution that no part of the proceeds of the state poll tax shall ever be diverted to the payment of the expense of collecting it. We think, however, that the whole force of this word is directed to the point that the state school funds must only be applied to the support of primary and grammar schools to the exclusion of the other classes of schools which may be established by the legislature, or by municipal or district authority. If we are right in this view, the only remaining question is whether the statutes referred to are in conflict with section 12 of article 13. The question, in other words, is whether, by that section, the legislature is deprived of the power to make the poll taxes pay the expense of their own collection?

As bearing upon this question, it is material to note the fact that from the very beginning of legislation in California, until the adoption of the present constitution, the collectors of poll taxes were always authorized to retain a percentage of their collections as compensation for their services. The various statutory provisions on this subject are cited in the briefs of counsel, but we deem it sufficient in this place to refer only to sections 3839, 3862, and 1857 of the Political Code, as they existed from its adoption in 1872 up to the adoption of the constitution in 1879, in which the substance of the earlier statutes is embodied. It is material, we say, to note this uniform course of legislation, because the framers of the new constitution must be presumed to have been familiar with it; and we are therefore entitled to expect that, if they intended to effect a radical change in the system, their purpose will be found plainly and unequivocally expressed. We do not, however, see anything in either of the sections of the constitution above referred to, or in both combined, which clearly deprives the legislature of the power to make the poll taxes pay the expense of collection. It is fair and reasonable and just that they should be charged with such expense, and indeed the fact that they are exclusively a state tax makes it peculiarly appropriate that the agents for their collection should be compensated by a percentage of their collection, rather than out of the salary or general funds of the counties. The fact that the legislature might abuse the power claimed is no argument against its existence. Most if not all of the unquestioned powers of the legislature are capable of being abused.

but there is no presumption that they will be; and, as to this particular matter, no change has been made in the rule that had existed for nearly 30 years before the adoption of the present constitution, and which has scarcely been questioned during the 15 years that have since elapsed. Independent of authority, we should feel little hesitation in holding upon these grounds that the law in question here is entirely consistent with the constitution, and this conclusion is only strengthened by reference to the cases decided in other states having similar constitutional provisions. Besides the cases in which it has been held that it is only just that every tax should bear the necessary expense of its collection, the case of Shaver v. Robinson, 59 Ala. 195, is directly in point, and clearly sustains the validity of this law. State v. Donnelly, 20 Nev. 214, 19 Pac. 680, involves the same principle, and is decided the same way. And, while it appears that several other states have similar constitutional provisions and similar legislation, the validity of such legislation does not seem to have been questioned. The case cited and relied upon by the respondent and by the learned judge of the superior court as sustaining a contrary view will be found, on careful examination, to involve no constitutional question, but to have been decided altogether upon a construction of the statutes of Indiana, by which it was expressly provided that the fees of officers for collecting, managing, and disbursing the tuition fund should be paid by the counties. State v. Commissioners of St. Joseph Co., 90 Ind. 362. Our conclusion is that the statutes in question are not in conflict with section 12 of article 13 of the constitution.

But counsel for respondent further contends that the only law under which Felts can claim a percentage of poll taxes was passed after his election, and therefore it is, as to him, inoperative, by reason of section 9 of article 11 of the constitution, which prohibits any increase of compensation of county officers after their election, or during their term of office. His argument is that the enactment of section 4334 of the Political Code, on March 10, 1891, and subsequent to the election of Felts, operated a repeal by implication of the various statutory provisions then in force allowing compensation for collecting poll taxes, and that Felts can claim nothing under the law thereafter enacted. We think it very doubtful, in the first place, whether there is any such necessary conflict between the terms of section 4334 of the Political Code and the laws in question as to operate a repeal by implication; but, assuming that there was such direct conflict that both could not operate together, no repeal took place, because the amendment to the Code did not take effect until 60 days after its passage, before which time the county government law had been passed, and took effect March 31, 1891. St. 1891, p. 295. This was the last expression of the legislative will, and must prevail (Goodwin v. Buckley, 54 Cal. 295), and it allows the compensation claimed. See section 216. For these reasons, we conclude that the superior court erred in its judgment as to the percentage of state poll taxes.

As to the road poll tax, that is a tax collected under the law, and not, as assumed in respondent's argument, by virtue of the county ordinance passed subsequent to the election of Felts. By section 2652 of the Political Code the supervisors of each county are authorized to levy a poll tax not exceeding three dollars; and by the same law the road overseer, when charged with the duty of making the collection, was allowed 15 per cent. of the amount collected for his services. Section 2654. By an amendment to section 2652, which took effect in January, 1893, the duty of collecting this tax was transferred to the county assessor (St. 1891, p. 478); and it was no increase of his compensation, within the sense of the constitution, to allow him for those collections the previously established percentage for the collection of all poll taxes. In other words, if a law is in existence at the time an officer is elected, which gives him a certain compensation for performing a certain service, it is no violation of the constitution to pass a subsequent law, under which he is compelled to perform the same service oftener than before, for, although the gross income of the office may thus be increased, the compensation of the officer has not been increased, in the sense of the constitution. The rule is the same, first and last, i. e. a certain sum for a certain service,—compensation in proportion to duty, —the very rule which it was the design of the constitution to establish. The part of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

ROBERTS v. GEBHART et al. (No. 19,398.)

PUBLIC LANDS—SELECTION BY STATE—APPROVAL BY SECRETARY OF INTERIOR.

1. Where the selection of land by a state in lieu of other land has never been approved by the secretary of the interior, a purchaser from the state has no equity as against one who holds a patent for the lands, though issued with notice of his prior claim.

2. The decision of the land commissioner in vacating a selection of land made in lieu of other land by a state is final where the state does not appeal, though the reason assigned for such order is insufficient.

3. Where the purchaser of lands selected in lieu of other land by a state has notice of an order vacating the selection, and fails to appeal therefrom, but permits another to perfect a homestead claim to the land, such laches will bar him from any relief.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by Nathan P. Roberts against Sherman W. Gebhart and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order overruling a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Pope and D. K. Trask, for appellant. Rolfe & Rolfe and Goodcell & Leonard, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The state of California, on May 16, 1885, upon the application of the plaintiff, filed with the register of the proper United States land office its selection of the land described in the complaint in lieu of a portion of a certain thirty-sixth section. This selection was approved by the register of the United States land office, and on July 25, 1885, the state issued to the plaintiff a certificate of purchase of said land. On July 16, 1885, the commissioner of the general land office canceled the state's selection, giving as his reason for such action that the land in lieu of which the selection was made had already served as the basis of a prior selection by the state, and on the 23d of the same month the state was notified of such cancellation. No appeal was ever taken from this ruling of the commissioner. On July 23, 1886, the defendant Gebhart was allowed to enter the same land as a homestead entry under the laws of the United States, and on September 22, 1887, he was permitted to commute his homestead entry, and to make final proof and payment for the land. It further appears that in September, 1888, the commissioner of the general land office discovered that the order of July 16, 1885, canceling the selection made by the state, was based upon a mistake of fact, and said order of cancellation was thereupon rescinded, and the state's selection reinstated upon the records of the general land office. The discovery of this mistake seems to have been induced by a letter written to the commissioner by the attorney for the plaintiff some time after the month of August, 1886. November 11, 1890, the commissioner again ruled that the state's selection must be canceled because of the fact that the entry of the defendant Gebhart had been perfected after the former cancellation of such selection, and before the order for its reinstatement. Upon an appeal herefrom, taken by the plaintiff to the secretary of the interior, this latter decision of the commissioner of the general land office was affirmed, and thereafter the United States issued to the defendant Gebhart its patent for the land in controversy. The plaintiff seeks by this action to obtain a judgment and decree that he is the equitable owner of the land, and that the defendant Gebhart holds the legal title thereto in trust for him, and that the other defendants, claiming under defendant Gebhart as mortgagees, accepted their mortgages with notice of plaintiff's equitable right to the land. The defendants recovered judgment in the superior court, and the plaintiff appeals.

1. It is argued in behalf of plaintiff that one who first initiates proceedings to acquire the legal title to public land has the superior right thereto, if he does or offers to do all that the law requires of him in order to entitle him to a patent therefor; and if, by the wrong or mistake of the officers of the land department, he fails to secure the legal title from the government, and a patent is issued to another, with notice of his prior rights, a court of equity will, under such circumstances, protect the first applicant by decreeing that the person who has thus taken the legal title conveyed by the patent holds such title in trust for him who was first in time in the commencement of proceedings to acquire such title. There is abundant authority for this proposition. Lytle v. Arkansas, 9 How. 314; Buckley v. Howe, 86 Cal. 596, 25 Pac. 132; Lindsay v. Hawes, 2 Black, 554; Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72; Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330. But we are of the opinion that the facts of this case are not such as to entitle the plaintiff to invoke this equitable rule. In the first place, the selection made by the state upon application of the plaintiff was not approved by the secretary of the interior, and therefore such attempted selection did not give to the state any legal or equitable right to the land therein described. In the case of Buhne v. Chism, 48 Cal. 471, this court, in passing upon the effect of such a selection, and the necessity for its approval by the secretary of the interior, said: "We think the approval of the secretary of the interior was essential to a valid selection and location by the state; and that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show affirmatively that he had approved it. The act of March 3, 1853, provides in terms that the selection shall be subject to his approval, and we have no authority to dispense with it. This condition was doubtless inserted for the reason that, in the opinion of the highest officer of the land department, the land might be required in the future for public uses; and it was intended that he should exercise his judgment in the premises before the selection should be valid." It is true the question in that case related to the legal title of the land there in controversy, but the reasoning of the court will go far to support the position that such a selection, when the secretary of the interior has acted upon and refused to approve it, does not confer even an equitable right upon the state, or upon one claiming under it, such as would authorize or justify a court of equity in reviewing the grounds or basis for such refusal. It is the consent of the United States, as manifested by the approval of the secretary of the interior, which gives legal efficacy to the application or selection made by the state; and without such approval neither the state nor its grantee is in a position to call in question any future disposition which the United States may make of the land embraced in the attempted selection. In Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Price Co., 133 U. S. 496, 10 Sup. Ct. 341,—a case in which the question of title to a selection of lieu land under a grant made to the state by congress to aid in constructing a railroad was involved, the act making the grant requiring the selection to be approved by the secretary of the interior,—the court held: "The act of the secretary of the interior in approving the selection of indemnity lands by a railroad land grant company to supply deficiencies in selections within the place limits is judicial, and until it is done the company has no equitable right in the selected tracts; and this rule is not affected by the fact that such a refusal was given under a mistake of law, and was subsequently withdrawn, and an assent given." The above quotation is taken from the syllabus, but it correctly states the decision of the court upon the point; and the court, in the course of its opinion, uses this language, which is entirely applicable here: "The approval of the secretary was essential to the efficacy of the selections, and to give to the company any title to the lands selected. His action in that matter was not ministerial, but judicial. He was required to determine, in the first place, whether there were any deficiencies in the land granted to the company, which were to be supplied from indemnity lands; and, in the second place, whether the particular indemnity lands selected could be properly taken for those deficiencies. In order to reach a proper conclusion on these two questions, he had also to inquire and determine whether any of the lands in the place limits had been previously disposed of by the government, or whether any pre-emption or homestead rights had attached before the line of the road was definitely fixed. * * * Until the selections were approved, there were no selections in fact, only preliminary proceedings taken for that purpose, and the indemnity lands remained unaffected in their title."

2. But, even if it should be conceded that the plaintiff, by virtue of his application, and the selection made by the state, is in a position to call in question the grounds of the decision of the secretary of the interior in refusing to approve the state's selection, the concession would not help him, for, in our opinion, the action of the secretary ought to be sustained for the reasons stated by him in affirming the decision of the commissioner. In that decision the secretary said: "It is asserted by counsel for Gebhart that the state had notice, July 23, 1885, of your decision of July 16, 1885. This is not denied. The local officers were directed to give the state notice. Under these circumstances, and in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it will be assumed that notice was given of that decision. If the state was dissatisfied with the order for cancellation of that date, it should have appealed; and in failing to do so that action should have been final, although the reason assigned in that order may not have been sufficient. * * * But in any event, I do not see that the appellant, Roberts, has any cause for complaint. He says, in his affidavit, that he knew of the order of July 16, 1885, canceling the state's selection in August, 1886. Granting that this was the first information he had or the state had, he then had sixty days in which to appeal. This information was within forty days after Gebhart made his homestead entry, and, the land then being subject to entry by your order under the land laws of the United States, it was his (Roberts') privilege to contest the entry of Gebhart on the ground of prior settlement. Again, he allowed Gebhart to make final proof and payment for the land a year after he had knowledge of the order, without protest. It will be assumed that he had personal knowledge of Gebhart's claim, as it is shown that both parties were actually residing on the land from the date of Gebhart's entry to his final proof. So that it would seem appellant has slept on whatever rights he may have had." In these views we entirely concur. Judgment and order affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al. v. WILLIAMS et al.

(No. 18,309.)

FINDING—ACCOUNTING.

In an action for a settlement of a mining copartnership, a finding that certain defendant copartners are indebted to the "copartnership" does not authorize a judgment that the sum be paid to "plaintiffs."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. Williams and others against John W. Williams and others. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. J. Ridge, for appellants. J. M. Walling, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by five tenants in common of a mining claim against four other tenants in common in said claim, for a partition of the mining claim, and the settlement of a mining copartnership. Judgment was rendered generally for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

We do not see anything necessary to be noticed in any of the points made by appellants except the last one, to wit, that the findings do not support the judgment, because the former shows that each of the defendants is indebted in a stated amount to the partnership, while the judgment declares that each defendant is indebted to the plaintiffs in the said amount of money, and decrees that the said amount of money owing by each defendant to the partnership be paid to the plaintiffs. It is quite probable that the words "to the partnership," in the findings, were placed there inadvertently; but we must take the record as we find it. Of course, a finding that certain copartners are each indebted in a stated amount to the copartnership does not warrant a judgment that the same amount be paid to the partners. For this reason the judgment must be reversed.

Respondents move to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the judgment was satisfied before the appeal was taken, but the affidavit on file does not show that fact. The motion to dismiss is therefore denied. The judgment is reversed.

In re CARRIGER'S ESTATE. (No. 15,515.)

Review on Appeal—Discretion of Court.

An order granting a new trial will only be reversed for an abuse of discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. W. Crawford, Judge.

Proceedings for the probate of the will of William W. Carriger. There was a verdict for contestant, Kate C. Carriger, that the will was executed by testator while under undue influence; and, from an order granting a new trial, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. S. Barnes, Dunne & McPike, and J. P. Rogers, for appellant. Barclay Henley and S. V. Costello, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The alleged last will of William W. Carriger, deceased, having been proposed for probate by the executor therein named, a contest thereof was made by Kate C. Carriger, the widow of the deceased, upon the grounds: First, that the deceased was not of sound and disposing mind and memory at the time the will was made; and, second, that the will was made under the undue influence of Alfred Boggs Carriger, a brother of deceased. Nine special issues were presented to a jury. The first issue was this: "Was said William Carriger, at the time of the making of said will, a man of weak mind, vacillating, and easily led?" To this the jury answered, "No." The next seven issues so presented were about intermediate probative facts, and were answered by the jury favorably to the contestant. The ninth and last issue, which contained the pith of the charge of undue influence, was as follows: "Did the said William W. Carriger, at the time of the making of the will in question, understand and know what he was about, and does it express his real wishes, and dispose of his estate in accordance with his own independent judgment and desire, entertained by him at the time of its execution?" To this the jury answered, "No." The proponent moved that the verdict be set aside, and for a new trial, and the court below granted the motion, and ordered a new trial. From the order granting a new trial the contestant appeals.

The motion for a new trial was based upon alleged errors of law occurring at the trial, and upon the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, the particulars of said insufficiency being fully set forth. The order of the court below granting the motion for a new trial does not state the ground upon which it was based. It must be sustained, therefore, if it be justified on any of the grounds upon which the motion was made. We will pass over the alleged errors of law, which do not seem to be of vital importance, and assume that the motion was granted for insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. Taking this view of the case, we see no good reason for disturbing the order appealed from. When the judge of a trial court is satisfied that a verdict is not warranted by the evidence, he should set it aside; and when he does so his order granting a new trial will not be reversed, unless it appears to this court that he had no reasonable and just ground for holding that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. The mere fact that there is some conflicting evidence on the points at issue does not preclude him from exercising the supervisory power of granting a new trial, which is clearly given him. Dickey v. Davis, 39 Cal. 569; Sherman v. Mitchell, 46 Cal. 580; Irving v. Cunningham, 58 Cal. 306; Breckenridge v. Crocker, 68 Cal. 403, 9 Pac. 426; Bronner v. Wetzlar, 55 Cal. 419; Pierce v. Schaden, Id. 406; Phelps v. Mining Co., 39 Cal. 410; Peters v. Foss, 16 Cal. 358; Curtiss v. Starr, 85 Cal. 376, 24 Pac. 806. This court, will, of course, reverse orders denying or granting new trials in extreme cases. No absolute rule of universal application can be formulated. This court has approximated such a rule, as nearly as may be, by saying that a motion for a new trial is addressed to the sound, legal discretion of the trial judge, and that an order granting or refusing it will not be disturbed unless it appears that there has been a manifest abuse of discretion. See cases above cited. Such language has been used by nearly every justice who has sat on this bench, and it is not open to just adverse criticism.

It would serve no useful purpose to recite here the evidence given at the trial of the case at bar. The most that could be said of it favorable to the contention of appellant is that it was somewhat conflicting. But it would be preposterous to say that the evidence was of such a character that the judge, in holding it insufficient to warrant the verdict, stepped out of his legitimate province, exceeded his real powers, and manifestly abused his discretion. The will in question was made by a man in the prime of life, and in the full possession of his mental powers. He went alone to a lawyer's office, and, after some consultation, directed him to prepare his will according to his instructions then given. In a day or two he returned alone to the lawyer's office, and, the will having been prepared according to his instructions, he then and there executed it in accordance with the forms of law. The occupant of a neighboring office was called in, who, with the lawyer, signed as subscribing witness. Neither his brother Boggs nor any other relation or person was with the testator upon these occasions. To set aside a will made under these circumstances is a serious matter, and a verdict having that effect should be closely scrutinized by the trial judge. The upsetting of wills is a growing evil. In the case at bar the judge may well have thought that the verdict was founded (insensibly, perhaps) more upon the jury's own notion of what the will ought to have been, than upon a conclusion from the evidence that the instrument in question did not express the testator's own wishes, and is not, therefore, his will. The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

MONTGOMERY v. SANTA ANA & W. RY. CO. (No. 19,277.)

RAILROAD IN STREET—RIGHTS OF ABUTTING OWNER—EJECTMENT—WHEN LIES.

1. Civ. Code, § 1112, provides that "a transfer of land bounded by a highway passes the title to the soil of the highway to the center thereof." Held, that where land is acquired by a city, the owner of land abutting on a street, though owning to the center of the street, cannot complain of its use for railroad purposes conducive to the public good, and not interfering with his right to its use as a highway.

2. Ejectment cannot be maintained by an abutting owner against a railroad company operating its road on his half of a public street under permission from the city, he having no present right of possession, of which he has been deprived.

3. A railroad operated in a public street imposes no greater burden on the abutting property by carrying freight than by carrying passengers only.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Ejectment by Victor Montgomery against the Santa Ana & Westminster Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jas. G. Scarborough, for appellant. Victor Montgomery, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of a strip of land in the city of Santa Ana, county of Orange. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Defendant, by its answer, set up two separate defenses. In the second of these it set out (1) that it is a corporation with power to construct and operate a steam railroad for the transportation of freight and passengers from the city of Santa Ana to Westminster, across, along, and upon any street, avenue, or highway; (2) that a strip of land 30 feet in width off the entire north side of the land described in the complaint was and is a public street or highway in said city of Santa Ana, under the control of and in the possession of the board of trustees of said city; (3) that said board of trustees, by ordinance, authorized and licensed defendant to construct and operate a railroad through and over said street, for carrying freight and passengers in cars to be propelled by dummy or motor engines; (4) that it constructed its road on said street, and operated it as provided in said ordinance; (5) that it has not excluded plaintiff or others from the street, and has only used it for the purpose aforesaid, and in common with the public, and has not impaired said street, or curtailed the use thereof by others, etc. To this defense plaintiff demurred, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. The demurrer was sustained by the court, and defendant declined to amend as to this defense, and the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer is urged as error.

The whole proposition involved in this case may be put thus: Can the owner in fee of land abutting upon a public street in an incorporated town maintain an action of ejectment against a railroad company organized and existing for the transportation of freight and passengers from said town to a neighboring town, which company, under and by virtue of an ordinance of the trustees of the first-designated town empowering it to do so, has constructed and is using a railway track upon and over said public street, and upon the side or half thereof adjoining the land of such abutting owner? The question is stated thus for the reason that, while the evidence in the case, consisting of the deed to respondent and the city map together, show that his land abutted upon the street in question, viz. Second street, in the city of Santa Ana, yet by section 1112 of the Civil Code "a transfer of land bounded by a highway passes the title of the person whose estate is transferred to the soil of the highway to the center thereof, unless a different intent appears from the grant." There is nothing in the evidence to indicate the contrary, and hence we must presume respondent owns to the center of the highway or street, subject only to the right of the public to an easement or right of way for street purposes therein and thereto. All streets are highways, but not all highways are streets. Common Council v. Croas, 7 Ind. 9; City of Lafayette v. Jenners, 10 Ind. 74; Clark v. Com., 14 Bush, 166. In other words, there is a wide distinction between a highway in the country and a street in a city or village, as to the mode and extent of the enjoyment, and, as a sequence, in the extent of the servitude in the land upon which they are located. The country highway is needed only for the purpose of passing and repassing, and as a general rule, to which there are a few needed exceptions, the right of the public and of the authorities in charge is confined to the use of the surface, with such rights incidental thereto as are essential to such use. In the case of streets in a city there are other and further uses, such as the construction of sewers and drains, laying of gas and water pipes, erection of telegraph and telephone wires, and a variety of other improvements, beneath, upon, and above the surface, to which in modern times urban streets have been subjected. These urban servitudes are essential to the enjoyment of streets in cities, and to the comfort of citizens in their more densely-populated limits. It has sometimes been suggested that a distinction is to be made between cases in which streets are laid out and opened upon property belonging to the corporation, and those in which streets become such by dedication, or by condemnation proceedings under the right of eminent domain upon compensation being made; but the consensus of modern opinion seems to be that no such distinction properly exists, and that "whether the corporation be the owner of the fee of the streets in trust for the public, or whether it be merely the trustee of the streets and highways as such, irrespective of any title to the soil, it has the power to authorize their appropriation to all such uses as are conducive to the public good, and do not interfere with their complete and unrestricted use as highways." People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 202; City of Cincinnati v. White's Lessee, 6 Pet. 432; Thomp. Highw. p. 7; Elliott, Roads & S. p. 305. It is said by Elliott, in his work on Roads and Streets, at page 299, that "it is doubtful whether, of all servitudes, there is one so broad and comprehensive as that of a city in its streets." It authorizes the use of the street for the track of a street-car company under license by the city authority, without compensation to the owner of the fee. Finch v. Railway Co., 87 Cal. 598, 25 Pac. 765.

A "street railway" has been defined as "a railway laid down upon roads or streets for the purpose of carrying passengers." Elliott, supra, 557. It is further said by the same author that "the distinctive and essential feature of a street railway, considered in relation to other railroads, is that it is a railway for the transportation of passengers, and not of freight." It is said to exclude the idea of the carriage of freight, and that a railroad over which heavily-laden freight trains are drawn cannot be considered a street railway. Street cars are little more than carriages for transportation of passengers, propelled over fixed tracks, to which their wheels are adapted, and as a convenient, comfortable, and economical mode of conveyance, their use has become well-nigh universal in cities, and as they add, when properly constructed, little or nothing to the burdens of the servient tenement, their use is upheld without the necessity of compensation to the abutting owner. The use of a public street, however, for an ordinary railway for the transportation of freight and passengers, it has been said by the highest authority, imposes a new burden upon the street, not contemplated in its dedication, and therefore the user cannot be indulged without compensation to the abutting owner of property upon such public street. We are at a loss for any good reason for this distinction, or to see why the transportation of freight by modern and improved methods is not equally entitled to encouragement with the transportation of passengers. The essential wants of the citizen demand the former equally with the latter. If there is any difference in the burden imposed upon the street, it is in degree, and not in kind. The great highways of England were constructed, not so much for the convenience of passengers as for the transportation of freight. In the infancy of commerce, when trade and traffic by land was insignificant in volume, when the sumpter horse, which answered to our modern pack mule, answered all the purposes of transportation for goods, footpaths, bridlepaths, and lanes served all needed purposes; but with the growth of inland commerce, and the need of greater facilities for the interchange of commodities, the use of wheeled vehicles, and, as a means thereto, the highway, as we know it, became a necessity. The Appian Way, commenced 312 B. C., which has provoked the admiration of the world, was entitled to commendation for its roadway 16 feet in width, constructed for the transportation of burdens, while the paths of 8 feet on each side of it for foot passengers, and upon which the Roman legions were wont to march, were unpaved. In the construction of modern highways, urban and suburban, the great difficulty and the prominent object has been to build and adapt them, by grade, width, and structure of roadbed, to the carriage of freight. Yet we are told in effect that, so far as modern methods are concerned,—so far as ease, speed, and economy are involved,—improvements are to be limited to the transportation of passengers; that cars with wheels adjusted to move upon fixed tracks, when applied to the transportation of passengers, are within the contemplated objects in view in opening a road or street, and therefore add nothing material to the burden of the servitude of the abutting landowner, while a precisely similar structure, adapted to the transportation of freight, adds an additional burden, of a different character, to the servitude, and cannot be tolerated without compensation to the abutting owner. An interminable string of heavy drays may thunder through the street from early morning until set of sun, a menace to all who frequent the thoroughfare, and an inconvenience to all dwellers thereon; but the cars of a railway, which move usually but a few times a day, and with infinitely less annoyance to the public, upon tracks so adjusted to the surface as to occasion little or no inconvenience, cannot be tolerated. We fail to appreciate the philosophy of the distinction. On the contrary, we affirm that, when a public street in a city is dedicated to the general use of the public, it involves its use, subject to municipal control and limitations, for all the uses and purposes of the public as a street, including such methods for the transportation of passengers and freight as modern science and improvements may have rendered necessary, and that the application of these methods, and indeed of those yet to be discovered, must have been contemplated when the street was opened and the right of way obtained, whether by dedication, purchase, or condemnation proceedings, and hence that such a user imposes no new burden or servitude upon the owner of the abutting land. The object of the user being within the conceded rights of the public, the methods of its accomplishment are subject to legislative control, and subject, also, to an action for damages by any abutting owner, whether or not he may be vested with the fee to the center of the street, whose right of ingress and egress, or his right to light and air, shall be interfered with.

The thirteenth subdivision of section 862 of the municipal government act of this state authorizes the boards of trustees of municipalities of the sixth class, of which Santa Ana is one, "to permit, under such restrictions as they may deem proper, the laying of railroad tracks and the running of cars drawn by horses, steam or other power thereon * * * in the public streets." The world moves. Legislation in recent times has kept pace with the progress of the age. The trend of judicial opinion, except where overshadowed and incrusted with stare decisis, is to a broader and more comprehensive view of the rights of the public in and to the streets and highways of city and country; and, while carefully conserving the rights of individuals to their property, the courts have not hesitated to declare the shadowy title which the owner of the fee holds to the land in a public street or highway, during the duration of the easement of the public therein, as being subject to all the varied wants of the public, and essential to its health, enjoyment, and progress. In Paquet v. Railway Co., 18 Or. 233, 22 Pac. 906, which was an action to enjoin a steam-motor railway company from constructing and operating its road upon a street in the city of Portland and upon a county road outside the city, abutting upon both of which the plaintiff owned land, with the fee in him vested to the center of the street and road, and where no compensation had been made to plaintiff, the court in its opinion, by Thayer, C. J., in deciding the cause against plaintiff, said: "The establishment of a public highway practically divests the owner of a fee to the land upon which it is laid out, of the entire present beneficial interest, of a private nature, which he has therein. It leaves him nothing but the possibility of a reinvestment of his former interest in case the highway should be discontinued as such. This view, I am aware, is contrary to the ancient doctrine that the owner of the fee owned the land subject only to such public uses, and that he had a right of action when the use was diverted to a different purpose. Such a doctrine may have been applicable where the ownership was merely subject to a right of way over the land; but where, as in modern cases, it is devoted exclusively to the purposes of a public thoroughfare, and the control thereof is committed to legally constituted authorities charged with the duty of maintaining it for such purpose, the doctrine becomes a vague theory, and should be laid away among the antiquities of the past age." McQuaid v. Railway Co., 18 Or. 237, 22 Pac. 899, enunciates a like doctrine. In Henry Gauss & Sons Manuf'g Co. v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. Ry. Co. (Mo. Sup.) 20 S. W. 658, the supreme court of Missouri held, in substance, that the construction and operation of an ordinary steam railroad at grade in a public street under municipal authority is not a new public use of the street, for which compensation may be demanded by abutting owners, as in the case of property "taken or damaged," within the meaning of the constitution. The court said: "When land is dedicated generally, and without restrictions, or condemned, for a public street, in a town or city, the owner of the abutting lots, who secures the benefit of the street, and persons also who purchase and improve property thereon, hold their property rights subject to all the uses to which the street can be lawfully subjected by the public. New uses in the improvement in the mode of travel and transportation are constantly arising. When there is no restriction on the public use, new modes of use may be adopted, which are consistent with the proper use of the street, without the consent of abutting owners, though such new uses may interfere somewhat with their own convenient use of the street. * * * For any damages that may be caused by an unlawful or negligent maintenance of the track in the street, or by negligent use of engines or movement of trains, defendant will be liable in an action for damages." This decision is in line with the decisions in that state. In Iowa a like doctrine prevails. In Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324,—which was ejectment in the United States court for the district of Iowa, to recover certain premises within a public street in Keokuk, occupied with railroad tracks, buildings, sheds, etc.,—upon error to the supreme court of the United States, that tribunal held that although no permanent obstruction, like a depot building, could be erected on the streets of a town, yet it is held in that state (Iowa) that they may, by public authority, be occupied by railway tracks without the consent of the adjacent proprietors, and without compensation, whether the fee of the streets, as in that case, be in him or in a third person. The court further held that there was no substantial difference between streets in which the legal title is in private individuals, and those in which it is in the public, as to the rights of the public therein. Kucheman v. Railway Co., 46 Iowa, 366. In New Jersey it is held: (1) That the legislature has power to authorize the use of a public highway for the purpose of a railway. (2) That the legislature must be the judges as to the benefit to the public, and to their authority the public and individuals must submit. (3) The authority to use a public highway for the purpose of a railroad, retaining the use of such highway for all ordinary purposes, is not such a taking of private property for public purposes as requires compensation to the owner of the fee of the adjacent lands, as is contemplated by their constitution. (4) That the easement of the highway is in the public, although the fee is practically in the adjacent owner. "It is the easement only which is appropriated, and no right or title of the owner is interferred with." Morris & Essex R. Co. v. Mayor, etc., of Newark, 10 N. J. Eq. 352. In Spencer v. Railroad Co., 23 W. Va. 406, which was a bill in equity to restrain defendant from constructing and operating an ordinary steam railroad over a public street, the fee of which was in plaintiff, under a license from the municipal authorities, the court used the following language: "Admitting she (the plaintiff) owns the fee to the middle of Seventh street opposite her lot, as she contends is the fact, she still owns the same, and neither her title or possession is in any manner disturbed by the railroad company. It has always been subject to the easement of the public to pass and repass over it and to use it as a street; and, subject to this easement, she has as much the enjoyment and possession of the whole of Seventh street as she ever had. What the railroad company has taken it has taken from the town council of Point Pleasant,—a mere easement,—and it has taken nothing from the plaintiff, and therefore, under West Virginia authorities referred to, she is entitled to no injunction." In Railroad Co. v. Sawyer, 92 Ill. 377, the supreme court of Illinois held that the public authorities who have the superintendence and control of the public roads may authorize travel on them by the means of a railroad, and, where a railroad company has constructed its road upon and along a public road, such use and possession is a matter between the road authorities and the railroad company, and the right cannot be questioned in an action of ejectment by the owner of the land over which the public road has been established.

This being an action of ejectment to recover a specific piece or parcel of land, and it appearing from the stipulation of the parties that the alleged ouster consisted only in the entry by the defendant upon a public street, and the construction of a railroad track thereon, no question of damage to property, other than to such public street, within the purview of section 14 of article 1 of the constitution of this state, can arise.

We may admit that the views herein expressed are in conflict with the doctrine enunciated in Railroad Co. v. Reed, 41 Cal. 256, and Muller v. Railway Co., 83 Cal. 240, 23 Pac. 265, and it does not necessarily follow that ejectment will lie, if the facts set out in the answer are true. The cases above quoted were to recover damages. The cases of Weyl v. Railroad Co., 69 Cal. 203, 10 Pac. 510, and Finch v. Railway Co., 87 Cal. 597, 25 Pac. 765, in which ejectments were upheld, were cases in which the defendants were mere intruders upon the public street, without valid license from any authorized body. The rule, as defined in Mahon v. Road Co., 49 Cal. 270, is regarded as the true one in cases of ejectment for injuries like the one complained of here. It was said in that case: "The exclusion of the plaintiff from entering on the land, except on the payment of a toll, and then only for the purpose of passing over the same, was a disseisin." In the present case the answer to which the demurrer was sustained averred: "That this defendant has not excluded the plaintiff, or any one else, from said street, or any part thereof, nor does it claim to hold said street, or any part thereof, exclusively from the plaintiff, or any one else whomsoever; but this defendant only claims the right to use the portion of said street actually occupied by said track in common with the public, under and by virtue of said ordinances of the said board of trustees of said city, and not otherwise." The action of ejectment is a possessory action, in which the plaintiff must show himself entitled to the present possession, and that he has been deprived thereof. Anything which deprives a plaintiff of his present right of possession will deprive him of the remedy of ejectment. The case of Redfield v. Railroad Co., 25 Barb. 54, is on all fours with the present case; and the court there held that the claim of an easement was not a claim of title, and that the mere user of such easement by license of the public, without excluding others from a like user, did not amount to an ouster for which ejectment would lie,—intimating, but without deciding, that trespass was in such a case the proper remedy. Railroad Co. v. Sawyer, supra, is to like effect. The municipal authorities, as trustees of the public, are in possession of the public streets, and hold them for the uses of the public as effectually as they do or may the public buildings of the municipality. A writ of restitution which should put the plaintiff in possession of the street, except as one of the public, would constitute him guilty as a trespasser, or of a nuisance, or of erecting a purpresture, as the facts might determine. It has been said that a writ which authorized A. to be placed in possession of real property, subject to the possession of B., is an absurdity. Where A. enters upon a public street and constructs a railroad without authority from the municipal authorities, ejectment will lie, as was held in Weyl v. Railroad Co. and in Finch v. Railway Co. This rule proceeds upon the theory that, as defendant does not justify under one having a right to possession, it matters not, as to him, that another than the plaintiff may have a better right than either of the parties to the action. A reversioner may maintain an action for an injury to his reversionary right, but cannot recover possession until the limited estate lapses. So the holder of the title to a public street, the possession of which is held for the public, may maintain an action for damages to his property therein, but, as against one who has taken no possession thereof, and is only in the exercise of an easement therein which is conferred by the municipal authorities in pursuance of their power, and which is valid as to the public, and which will expire with the easement of the public, of which it is a part, should not be permitted to maintain ejectment for a violation of his property rights, if any, but should be remitted to an injunction to restrain, or, if the injury is consummated, to an action for damages, or to proceedings to abate as a nuisance, as the case may be.

It follows that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the answer of the defendant. The judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer to defendant's second defense, set out in his answer.

KRAFT v. WILSON. (No. 18,281.)

UNAUTHORIZED ACT OF AGENT—RATIFICATION BY PRINCIPAL—ACQUIESCENCE.

1. As the ratification of an agent's act is equivalent to a prior command, a finding that an agent had authority to do an act is sustained by evidence that his principal ratified such act.

2. The question of ratification of an unauthorized act of an agent is a question of fact.

3. Plaintiff purchased from defendant's son-in-law certain stock, part of which belonged to him and defendant and part to defendant and his son, and all of which were running on the same ranch, and credited the amount on the son-in-law's account with him. Defendant, being told of the sale, gave other stock to his son, to satisfy him, but did not say anything to plaintiff, who had previously purchased stock from the son-in-law under similar circumstances, as was known to defendant. Defendant took an assignment from his son-in-law of all his interest in the stock on the ranch, and made several payments on what he himself owed plaintiff, and for which he had given his note, and also told him that his son-in-law had plenty of property to pay his debt, and at last gave him a mortgage two years after the sale to secure a balance he owed plaintiff. Held, that defendant, who had become the assignee of his son's interest, could not deny the son-in-law's authority to sell the stock belonging to defendant and his son.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Herbert Kraft against H. C. Wilson. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson & Chase and Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant. N. P. Chipman and L. V. Hitchcock, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action upon a promissory note made by the defendant December 1, 1888, for $7,981, payable to plaintiff or his order one day after date, with interest at 9 per cent, per annum, and in case of a suit for the collection thereof with 5 per cent. upon the amount found due as attorney's fees. Plaintiff claims a balance due of $3,838, besides interest, and $191.90 as attorney's fees and costs. Defendant answered, admitting the execution and validity of the note, and set up two counterclaims, aggregating $5,937.50. These counterclaims were disallowed by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals.

The whole case turns upon the validity of defendant's counterclaims. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the facts as found, bearing upon the questions involved, although lengthy, are essential to an understanding of the case, and are as follows:

"(1) That said C. G. Alexander is a son-in-law of defendant, and was so related to defendant ever since 1880; and the said H. F. Wilson was a son of H. C. Wilson, and that said H. F. Wilson is now deceased.

"(2) That the defendant owns, and has for many years owned, a large body of land in Warner valley, in the state of Oregon, used as a stock ranch, upon which he raised horses, mules and cattle.

"(3) That some years prior to 1883 the defendant and C. G. Alexander entered into a contract, by the terms of which the defendant let Alexander have charge of a number of mares and cattle. Alexander was to run these animals on the said Warner Valley ranch, and at the expiration of the lease or contract was to return to the defendant the same number of animals he had originally received; that is, to make the old stock good; and the balance, or the increase, was to be owned equally by the defendant and C. G. Alexander. In 1883 the defendant and Alexander had a settlement under the terms of their contract. All the animals at that time were branded with the 'heart' brand. In this settlement the animals that were counted out to make the old stock good were branded with the 'bar-heart' brand, to distinguish them from what might be termed the increase. The defendant then turned over to his said son, H. F. Wilson, all animals branded with the 'bar-heart' brand upon a contract by which said H. F. Wilson was to run the 'bar-heart' stock on the said Warner Valley ranch on shares, to pay all the expenses of running them, and at the end of the contract make the old stock good, and divide the increase between his father, the defendant, and himself. The 'heart' brand animals, of which C. G. Alexander was the owner of one-half, were then turned over to the said C. G. Alexander under a contract by which he was to run them on shares on the Warner Valley ranch, pay all the expenses of running them, and divide the increase equally between himself and the defendant, H. C. Wilson. All the stock in which H. F. Wilson was interested with defendant, and that in which C. G. Alexander was interested with the defendant,—the animals branded with the 'heart' brand and those branded with the 'bar-heart' brand,—ran promiscuously upon the Warner Valley ranch.

"(4) Accounts for supplies for the ranch were run at various stores in which supplies for all the ranch and all the stock upon it were charged, without any attempt to segregate the expenses incident to running the stock that H. F. Wilson had on shares from the expenses of the stock that C. G. Alexander had on shares.

"(5) From 1883 to 1889 H. F. Wilson was most of the time on the Warner Valley ranch, and while there had chief control of affairs. About 1889 he left, and did not return. A hard winter came, and destroyed 90 per cent. of the stock. H. F. Wilson and his father had no settlement, and H. F. Wilson, after the hard winter, practically abandoned the Warner Valley enterprise.

"(6) From the year 1884 up to the bringing of this action H. F. Wilson, C. G. Alexander, and H. C. Wilson did a large banking business with H. Kraft, the plaintiff. H. F. Wilson created an individual indebtedness with the plaintiff. C. G. Alexander created a large individual indebtedness with the plaintiff, and H. C. Wilson had an individual indebtedness with the plaintiff. In 1884, at the request of H. C. Wilson, an account was opened with H. Kraft under the name of H. C. Wilson and Alexander. The account ran along, until in March, 1886, it had grown quite large, amounting to over $7,000, when the defendant gave a note to the plaintiff, signed 'H. C. Wilson and Alexander,' in settlement of the account to that date. After this, checks continued to be drawn against the H. C. Wilson and Alexander account up to December 1, 1888. In September, 1886, H. C. Wilson paid the note in full of March, 1886. December 1, 1888, the amount of the H. C. Wilson and Alexander account had reached the sum of $7,981. On that day H. C. Wilson, at the request of plaintiff, gave his individual note for that amount, and the account of H. C. Wilson and Alexander was credited with the same amount, and closed. This note of December 1, 1888, is the one upon which this action is brought.

"(7) In the meantime the individual account of C. G. Alexander with the plaintiff had been growing from year to year. Some settlement of accounts had been made by Alexander by giving his individual notes. In September, 1890, he owed H. Kraft in all about $17,000.

"(8) In August, 1890, there was upon the Warner Valley ranch a large number of horses, mules, and cattle. The stock was in three different brands; some branded with a 'heart,' some with a 'bar-heart,' and some branded 'A. X.' H. C. Wilson and C. G. Alexander each owned an undivided one-half interest in the 'heart' brand animals. H. C. Wilson and H. F. Wilson each owned an undivided half interest in the 'bar-heart' brand animals, and C. G. Alexander owned the 'A. X.' brand animals.

"(9) In August, 1890, C. G. Alexander was in Warner Valley in charge of the ranch and all the stock on it, regardless of brands. During all the year 1890, H. C. Wilson resided, and for many years prior thereto had resided, in Tehama county, California, in which county H. Kraft also resided, and also H. F. Wilson. The defendant went to the Oregon ranch once or twice a year, and there remained from one to three weeks.

"(10) In August, 1890, 49 head of mules from the Warner Valley ranch were at Lakeview, Oregon, in possession of one Hereford, and held by him under a chattel mortgage signed 'Wilson & Alexander,' to secure a debt of over $2,100, due Cogswell & Ross, of Lakeview, jointly owned by H. C. Wilson and C. G. Alexander. The signatures thereto were written by Alexander, and at the time of their execution H. C. Wilson did not know of their execution.

"(11) In August, 1890, the plaintiff, being desirous of having something paid on the C. G. Alexander indebtedness to him, sent a man by the name of Estes to buy mules of Alexander, and credit the amount agreed to be paid upon Alexander's indebtedness. Estes, in pursuance of his employment, bought of Alexander 33 mules branded with a 'bar-heart,' 29 mules branded with a 'heart,' and 12 mules branded 'A. X.' For part of these mules he agreed to pay eighty dollars per head, and for a part eighty-five dollars per head. $2,100 were paid in cash to release the mules that were in pledge in Lakeview, Oregon, which mules were a part of his purchase, and the balance of the purchase price was credited on the individual indebtedness of C. G. Alexander to plaintiff.

"(12) After the purchase of said mules they were driven to Tehama county, California, and delivered to the plaintiff.

"(13) After the sale of the said mules, and after they had been delivered to the plaintiff, defendant, in September, 1890, went to Oregon, and had an interview with C. G. Alexander, at which time he was informed of the sale of the mules to plaintiff, and also as to what disposition had been made of the proceeds.

"(14) Defendant, H. C. Wilson, then took a bill of sale from C. G. Alexander of all his interest in the stock on the Warner Valley ranch in part payment of a large indebtedness due him (defendant) from Alexander.

"(15) Upon his return to Tehama county soon after, defendant had an interview with his son, H. F. Wilson, in which, for the purpose of preventing H. F. Wilson from informing plaintiff that he (H. F. Wilson) had an interest in a part of the mules sold to him by Alexander, he (defendant) let H. F. Wilson have mules of his to satisfy him (H. F. Wilson) for the mules Alexander had sold, and thereby prevent his (H. F. Wilson) saying to the plaintiff that Alexander had sold to plaintiff mules he had no authority or right to sell.

"(16) In November, 1890, defendant, at the request of plaintiff, gave to plaintiff a crop mortgage for the full amount of the note now being sued upon. After the execution of this mortgage defendant paid upon the said note as follows: July 11, 1891, $320.62; August 26, 1891, $1,833.05; December 26, 1891, $3,592.66; in all, $5,746.33.

"(17) June 5, 1891, defendant Wilson was again at Warner Valley, Oregon, and had an interview with C. G. Alexander, at which time Alexander gave to defendant a letter addressed to H. Kraft, in the following words and figures: 'Warner, June 5, 1891. H. Kraft: The mules I sold you last year, one-half of thirty-three head of "hearts," sixteen and a half, and the thirty-one "bar-hearts," I had no right to sell. Please turn them over to H. C. and H. F. Wilson. C. G. Alexander.' In a few days thereafter defendant returned to Tehama county, where he then resided, and where he has resided for many years, bringing the above letter with him. He did not deliver it to plaintiff nor inform him of its contents, but kept it until a day or two before this case was commenced, to wit, until January 21, 1892, when he handed it to one of his attorneys, who afterward read it to Mr. Kraft.

"(18) On June 21, 1891, C. G. Alexander and the plaintiff had a settlement, and on that day C. G. Alexander mailed to the plaintiff a new note for what he then owed the plaintiff. In arriving at the amount of this new note, what was agreed to be paid for the mules (less $2,100) had been deducted from the total indebtedness of the said Alexander, and the note was sent for the balance. Alexander signed this new note, and on the 22d day of June, 1891, inclosed it in a letter, and it reached the plaintiff in due course of mail.

"(19) During the summer and fall of 1891 defendant continued to make payments on the note now in suit, and several times had the plaintiff's bookkeeper figure up the amount due. As late as November 14, 1891, plaintiff wrote to defendant about the balance then due on note in suit, and told him he was getting tired of waiting for his money. In response to this letter, defendant came up and said he was not ready to sell the wheat. Prices were not high enough to suit. He would like to hold on a little longer. Had plaintiff's bookkeeper figure up how much the wheat would bring at a certain price, and how much that note amounted to, and talked about turning over some wheat that Harry had as further security. He didn't say a word at that time about H. Kraft owing him anything for mules. Again, after the 28th of December, in response to another letter from the plaintiff, the defendant came up again. He told Kraft, the plaintiff, that Harry was going to let him have the wheat, and he was going to sell it, and pay the money in, and talked about some wool he had—something he was going to turn also. On December 26, 1891, the defendant sent to plaintiff wheat receipts amounting to $3,599.66, for which he was given credit on the note in suit. This left a sum due to plaintiff from defendant, H. C. Wilson, much less in amount than the sum now claimed in the said defendant's counterclaim to be due from the said plaintiff to the said defendant.

"(20) At no time from August 9, 1890, to January 22, 1892, did defendant make any claim for the mules, or intimate that C. G. Alexander had done anything he did not have full authority to do." The foregoing are special findings, and are in addition to the general findings in the case in which it is found that Alexander had authority to sell the mules, etc.

From the findings, the court below concluded as matter of law "that the defendant, by his subsequent acts, conduct, and silence, as set forth in the above findings, has ratified the sale of all the mules sold by Alexander to the plaintiff, and should not now be permitted to question the validity of said sale." The propriety of this conclusion involves the important question in the case. "Ratification is the adoption of a previously formed contract, notwithstanding a vice which rendered it relatively void; and, by the very nature of the act of ratification, confirmation, or affirmance, the party confirming becomes a party to the contract." Herm. Estop. p. 1157. Where ratified by the principal, the unauthorized act of his agent is as binding upon him as though previous authority had been conferred upon such agent. The subsequent ratification has a retrospective effect, and is equivalent to a prior command. To say that an agent entered into a contract without authority from his principal, and that the principal subsequently ratified such contract, is, in legal intendment and effect, the equivalent of saying the agent was duly authorized to make the contract. The question of whether a contract made by an agent, or by one purporting to be such, has been ratified or adopted by the principal is one of fact, to be determined by a jury or by the court sitting in lieu thereof. Therein it differs from an estoppel in pais, which is a legal consequence,—a right arising from acts or conduct. Bigelow, Estop. (4th Ed.) p. 447. A full knowledge by the principal of all the material facts is a prerequisite to a finding that such principal has by his silence, acts, or declarations, in fact adopted the contract. Whart. Ag. § 65. The evidence which will authorize an assumption of ratification is or may be anything which convinces the mind of the intention on the part of the principal to adopt or approve the act, thus: (1) A principal who permits an unauthorized agent to act for him, and who stands by without interference while third persons deal with such agent as agent, cannot afterwards dispute the authority of such agent. (2) Silence of the principal when informed that the agent has entered into obligations in his name indicates acquiescence. (3) Proof of ratification may be inferred. We may infer ratification when the acts and conduct of the principal are inconsistent with any other theory than that he intended to ratify the transaction. It may be said, generally, that any act, conduct, or declaration from which an intent on the part of the principal to adopt the act of the agent appears is sufficient. Ratification being, as before stated, a fact, and the court having found thereon in favor of plaintiff, such finding must be upheld if supported by the evidence. The language of the general finding is "that said C. G. Alexander had authority to make said sale." The retrospective effect of a ratification is to place the contract and the contracting parties in the same position as though previous authority had been given; hence, if there was in fact proof of such ratification, the court was authorized to find the authority as stated in the finding.

Turning to the record, and we think the findings have substantial support in the evidence. Twelve of the mules purchased by plaintiff from Alexander were the property of the latter, and no question can arise as to them. As to the 33 mules included in the same purchase, owned by defendant and Alexander jointly, there was certainly evidence tending to show that Alexander had authority to make the sale, and hence to support the finding of the court to that effect. That Alexander held a power of attorney from the defendant, authorizing him to transact all business at the ranch in Oregon, seems conceded. The precise date at which this power was revoked (if revoked at all by the defendant) is left in doubt. Alexander, testifying as a witness, says: "I thought I had authority from H. C. Wilson to sell to Kraft or to any one else his half interest in the mules branded with the straight 'heart.' My opinion is based upon previous actions between us, and business matters. I had authority at one time so to sell—that is, up to three or four years ago—two years ago. It was a power of attorney to transact any and all business for him and in his name. It embraced everything, I supposed. Whether it embraced the stock or not, I do not know. It was a written authority. I have not the instrument. I had authority about eight years. It ceased about two years ago, when Mr. Wilson put that notice in the paper that he would not be responsible for any person in this county." Wilson himself testified that he published the notice in the paper after the sale of the mules to plaintiff. It is true, the extent of the authority under this power does not clearly appear, but, as I do not find that the defendant, who testified at length on his own behalf, and referred to the power, denies that it authorized a sale of stock, it is believed the court below was warranted in finding from all the circumstances that as to the mules branded with a "heart" Alexander had authority to sell. As to the mules branded with what is called a "bar-heart," and which were owned by defendant and his son, H. F. Wilson, no previous authority in Alexander to sell appears, and the sole question presented is as to the fact of ratification by the defendant, who is the assignee of his son, of all the interest of the latter therein. To discuss the testimony at length in support of the finding can subserve no useful purpose beyond the decision of the present case, and as the conclusion is irresistible that, although there is a substantial conflict in the testimony, there is yet such a showing in favor of the ratification by defendant of the sale that this court is not warranted in disturbing the finding.

If, however, it be conceded that where one has wrongfully taken the property of another, and sold it, not as agent, but on his own account, mere silence on the part of the owner does not confirm the sale, and that the confirmation must rest upon some consideration upholding it, or upon an estoppel,—a question upon which the authorities are divided,—still the evidence and the special findings are, as it is believed, sufficient to uphold the judgment. It is not the silence alone of the defendant, relied upon, but the care which he took to prevent knowledge of the true state of the case from coming to the plaintiff; his payments made upon the promissory note, when, if he claimed what he now sets up as a counterclaim, there was nothing due thereon; his giving a chattel mortgage to secure the amount due upon the note; his silence for nearly a year and a half, with full knowledge of all the facts, coupled with his declarations to plaintiff, as disclosed by the evidence, that Alexander was perfectly good for the amount he owed the plaintiff, had plenty of property, etc., at a time when he, the defendant, had an assignment of all of Alexander's interests in the stock, whereby plaintiff was lulled into security, and to take a new note extending credit to Alexander; and other minor circumstances indicating an intention to abide by the action of his son-in-law in the sale which the latter had made. That the testimony as to some of these facts was conflicting does not authorize us to discard the findings. Taken together, they bring the case within the rule enunciated by the lord chancellor before the house of lords in Cairncross v. Lorimer, 7 Jur. (N. S.) 149, where he said: "I believe, in the laws of all civilized nations, that if a man, either by words or by conduct, has intimated that he consents to an act which has been done, and that he will offer no opposition to it, although it could not have been lawfully done without his consent, and he thereby induces others to do that from which they otherwise might have abstained, he cannot question the legality of the act he had sanctioned, to the prejudice of those who have so given faith to his words, or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct." Or, as was said in Nicholson v. Hooper, 4 Mylne & C. 179, by Lord Cottenham: "A party claiming a title in himself, but privy to the fact of another dealing with the property as his own, will not be permitted to assert his own title against a title created by such other person, although he derives no benefit from the transaction." That defendant, in the face of the testimony to the numerous sales made by Alexander of stock from the ranch, was aware that the latter "was dealing with the property as his own," cannot be doubted. Plaintiff had previously purchased stock from Alexander under circumstances that may reasonably be assumed to have been known to the defendant, yet the latter offered no objection. Indeed, it appears from some of the testimony that defendant, his son, and Alexander in many respects acted as ostensible partners in all the stock, and in other respects acted as though they were severally owners of it.

Numerous objections were made to the introduction of testimony and to the refusal of the court to permit questions to be answered, but I fail to see that any of the errors assigned to the rulings of the court in this respect are well founded. A large number of these exceptions are based upon the action of the court touching testimony going to show that defendant and Alexander were copartners in the stock and in the business of conducting the ranch. As the court did not find a partnership to exist between the parties, such exceptions become unimportant. The exception urged in the brief of appellant, founded upon the refusal of the court below to permit defendant to testify as to how the account stood between Alexander and himself after witness received an assignment of Alexander's interest in the stock, is of no moment, for the reason that in answer to the very next question defendant was permitted to answer that the stock assigned to him did not pay his demand against Alexander by $30,000. So, too, the objection that defendant was not permitted to testify that his only knowledge of the sale was that Alexander had sold the stock as his own, and not as agent for defendant, was immaterial, for the reason that all the testimony tended to show that, whatever the authority of Alexander may have been as to a portion of the stock sold, he in fact sold it in his own name, and not in the name of or as the agent of defendant; and there is nothing in the findings in conflict therewith. There are other exceptions to evidence, but they are of no greater moment than those noticed, and need not be reviewed. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

JENNINGS v. JENNINGS et al. (No. 18,278.)

MORTGAGE BY GUARDIAN TO WARD — VALIDITY — DELIVERY—SATISFACTION.

1. The individual mortgage of a guardian of a minor to his ward to secure a debt due from him to the estate is good as against a subsequent mortgage, though the debt is secured by the guardian's bond, and there is no order of court fixing the amount thereof.

2. Where the guardian of a minor's estate makes his individual mortgage to his ward, to secure a debt due from him to the estate, has it recorded, and then delivers it to the mother of the minor, to be kept for him, there is a sufficient delivery.

3. A mortgage given by a guardian to his ward cannot be satisfied by the guardian without authority of court, and without payment of the debt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by W. O. Jennings, Jr., by his guardian, against W. O. Jennings, Sr., Frank G. Waterhouse, and others, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant Waterhouse appeals. Affirmed.

Holl & Dunn, for appellant. A. M. McCoy, H. P. Andrews, and James P. O'Brien, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. On March 5, 1887, W. O. Jennings, Sr., was appointed guardian of the estate of his minor son, W. O. Jennings, Jr., and thereafter he duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such guardian. On the 23d day of the same month he received for and on account of his said ward the sum of $1,000 in money, which he thereafter held and used until April 9, 1889. On the last-named day he executed to his ward his promissory note for $1,204.17, being for the said $1,000 and interest thereon to that date at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, compounded annually, and also a mortgage upon certain real property to secure payment of the note; and on the same day he caused the mortgage to be properly recorded in the records of the county, and shortly thereafter delivered both the note and mortgage to the mother of the boy, to be kept by her for him. On April 28, 1890, while he was still the guardian of the boy, he undertook to satisfy and discharge the said mortgage, and to that end made and entered upon the margin of the record thereof an indorsement as follows: "State of California, County of Tehama—ss.: Full satisfaction of this mortgage is hereby acknowledged this 28th day of April, A. D., 1890. W. O. Jennings, by Guardian of W. O., Junior. Attest: W. R. Hall, Recorder." On July 21, 1890, he and one Barnes executed to Frank G. Waterhouse their joint promissory note for $2,500, and a mortgage on the premises covered by the mortgage to the boy, and certain other real property, to secure payment of said note, which mortgage was also duly recorded. He continued to be the guardian of his son until August 19, 1891, when, by an order of court, he was removed, and his letters of guardianship were vacated and annulled. And at the same time A. J. McClure was duly appointed guardian in his place, and he was by the court ordered and directed to turn over to McClure all the property and estate belonging to his said ward. On March 21, 1892, W. O. Jennings, Jr., by his guardian, A. J. McClure, commenced this action to foreclose his mortgage of April 9, 1889, alleging, among other things, that the note secured thereby was due and wholly unpaid; that the attempted satisfaction of the said mortgage was invalid and void, and made without any authority or power in the said W. O. Jennings, Sr., so to do, and without any consideration whatever; and that the interest of the defendant Frank G. Waterhouse in the said premises, as mortgagee, was subsequent and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. The defendant Waterhouse demurred to the complaint upon several grounds, and his demurrer was overruled. He then answered, denying many of the averments of the complaint, and, among others, that the attempted satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgage was invalid and void, and setting up his own note and mortgage, and praying that they be adjudged to be a first lien upon the premises described in the complaint. After trial the court found the facts very fully, and, among others: "That the aforesaid satisfaction undertaken to be made and purporting to be made, and the said indorsement upon the margin of said record, were made and executed without any order or other authority of the court so to do, and without the said indebtedness, or any part thereof, having been paid, discharged, or in any way satisfied; and the said purported satisfaction of mortgage and the said indorsement upon the margin of said record were, and each of them was, wholly invalid and void, and of no legal force and effect. * * * That the said mortgage is now, and at all times since the said 9th day of April, 1889, has been, in full force and effect upon and against the land contained and described therein. That neither said note nor mortgage, nor any part of the principal sum therein mentioned, nor of the interest thereon, has ever been paid, and said mortgage has never been paid nor satisfied nor discharged." That the note and mortgage set up in plaintiff's complaint in this action were made for a valuable consideration, and were delivered as in these findings hereinbefore stated; and said note and mortgage were accepted by the mother of plaintiff for and on behalf of plaintiff, and it is for the interest of plaintiff that he should accept and receive said mortgage." Judgment was accordingly entered foreclosing the plaintiff's mortgage, and directing the sale of the mortgaged premises, and the application of the proceeds, after paying costs, expenses, and attorney's fees, to the payment of the amount found due the plaintiff; and from this judgment the defendant Waterhouse appeals.

1. The demurrer was properly overruled. The complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and was not obnoxious to any of the objections raised to it.

2. The appellant contends that the note and mortgage were given to secure payment of money already secured by the guardian's bond, and hence were without consideration; and also that when the mortgage was made the accounts between the guardian and his ward had not been settled, and the amount of the indebtedness established, by a competent court, and therefore the mortgage never had any validity. This contention cannot, in our opinion, be sustained. The note and mortgage were given for money which was the property of the mortgagee, and for which the mortgagor was personally responsible. This constituted a sufficient consideration for making the papers, and the fact that the mortgagor was the guardian of the estate of the mortgagee, and had given a guardian's bond, did not in any way affect the question. He had a right to give further security if he chose to do so. Nor was it necessary that the amount of the indebtedness be fixed and determined by any court in order to give validity to the mortgage.

3. The appellant further contends that the note and mortgage never became valid and binding obligations, because they were never delivered to any person authorized to receive them for the plaintiff. This contention is also, in our opinion, untenable. The case shows that the papers were properly executed, and the maker at once caused the mortgage to be duly recorded, and then delivered them both to plaintiff's mother for him. This, under the decisions in this state and elsewhere, constituted a sufficient delivery. In De Levillain v. Evans, 39 Cal. 120, the question arose as to the acceptance of a deed of gift of certain real property, and it was held that, "if the donee be of mature years, he will be presumed to have accepted it, if it be for his advantage, unless the contrary appears;" and that, "if the donation be to a minor, and to his advantage, the law accepts it for him." In Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 515, it is said: "But it is contended that the court below erred in overruling objections made to the offer in evidence of the deed to the plaintiff from his father, on the ground that it was not delivered. The deed was produced by the plaintiff. It was a deed from father to son. It showed that it had been duly acknowledged and recorded at the request of the grantor, and these constituted sufficient proof of delivery." In Cecil v. Beaver, 28 Iowa, 241, the court, by Dillon, C. J., said: "Where the deed to a child is absolute in form and beneficial in effect, and the grantor and father voluntarily causes the same to be recorded, this is, in law, a sufficient delivery to the infant, and the title to the lands will pass thereby. In such case actual, manual delivery and a formal acceptance are not necessary." And see, also, Rivard v. Walker, 39 Ill. 413; Mitchell v. Ryan, 3 Ohio St. 377; Spencer v. Carr, 45 N. Y. 406; Gregory v. Walker, 38 Ala. 26.

4. The only other question which need be considered is that relating to the attempted satisfaction of the mortgage by the mortgagor. A similar question arose in the case of Aldrich v. Willis, 55 Cal. 81. In that case Henry M. Willis received and appropriated to his own use money belonging to his infant daughter, Amelia. For the money he executed to Amelia his promissory note, and a mortgage to secure its payment, which he caused to be duly recorded. Subsequently, "acting as guardian," he entered upon the margin of the record a satisfaction of the mortgage, and then mortgaged the property to another party. At the time he received the money, and up to the time of the trial, he was acting as guardian of Amelia, but in fact he was not the guardian of her estate, never having received letters of guardianship, nor qualified as such. In department, this court, by McKinstry, J., said: "Nevertheless, Henry M. Willis was a trustee, holding the money of the infant, Amelia, Jr., which came into his hands in trust for her. The mortgage executed by him to secure such moneys was altogether for her benefit, and the fact that it is set up in her answer by her guardian ad litem, and relied upon herein, constitutes sufficient proof of delivery to and acceptance by her." And it was held that the mortgage was not satisfied, but was still in full force and effect. On petition for rehearing in bank, the court, by Thornton, J., delivered an opinion, concurred in by four other justices, in which, referring to the language above quoted, it is said: "To which we desire to add: 'And this must be so, since, if it [the mortgage] had not been for the benefit of the infant, the court below, it must be presumed, as it had control over the conduct of the guardian ad litem, would not have allowed him to set it up.'" And the opinion closes with the following statement: "Whether Henry M. Willis was guardian or not we consider immaterial. The same result follows whether he (Willis) was or was not the general guardian of the infant, Amelia Willis." It is earnestly claimed for appellant that the language last above quoted was entirely obiter, and should be disregarded; but we cannot see it in that light. Conceding that the statement was not necessary to a decision of that case, still we think it declared the law applicable to the case correctly. To hold otherwise, and say that a guardian, without any authority of court, and without the payment of the indebtedness, can, at his pleasure, satisfy and release a mortgage given by him to his ward, might greatly endanger the estates of wards, and lead to results not contemplated or authorized by law. Applying the rule declared in that case to this, it must be held that Jennings, Sr., under the circumstances shown, had no right to satisfy the mortgage to his ward, and that the attempted satisfaction of it was ineffectual and void. We find no errors in the record calling for a reversal, and therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

HOUSE v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (No. 19,404.)

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—CONTRACTS—ULTRA VIRES.

The appointment by the board of supervisors of a county of an agent to procure the redemption of lands sold to the state for taxes, and to collect the amount of such taxes due the county, with an agreement to pay him a commission on the amount collected, is ultra vires.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinney, Judge.

Action by R. F. House against Los Angeles county to recover for services rendered in collecting delinquent taxes. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and, defendant refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. C. Dillon, for appellant. McLachlan & York, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by R. F. House, the respondent here, to recover $460.56 for services rendered to the county of Los Angeles in the collection of money on account of delinquent taxes, in cases where real property had been sold to the state of California, and no redemption had. The plaintiff, in his complaint, sets out a contract in writing entered into on the 15th day of December, 1891, between him and the comptroller and attorney general of the state of California, in which the latter appointed the former to collect and cause to be collected, or cause to be redeemed, or to cause the payment of all moneys necessary to redeem, all property sold to the state for taxes from 1870, down to and including the forty-second fiscal year, and to take all necessary steps to cause said property to be redeemed; to serve all notices, etc. In consideration of which said House was to receive (1) all fees allowed by law for notices served; (2) such sum as the state board of examiners may allow on all moneys collected and paid to the county for the state, not exceeding 15 per cent. of the amount collected, etc. The appointment was for the territory embraced in what now composes the counties of Los Angeles and Orange. The complaint further avers that on or about December 29, 1891, the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles passed a resolution, of which the following is a copy: "Whereas, the state of California, through and by E. P. Colgan, state comptroller, and W. H. H. Hart, attorney general, has entered into a contract with R. F. House to proceed and cause to be collected from owners what may be due on account of sales of real estate heretofore made to the state for delinquent taxes, agreeing with him to pay him such percentage on such collections as the state board of examiners may allow, not to exceed fifteen per cent. (15 %) on the amount of such collection, it is therefore resolved, that the county of Los Angeles shall pay to said House such percentage on the amount of all redemptions as the state board of examiners may allow, not to exceed fifteen per cent. on such sum: provided, that such payment and allowance can be legally made; the said House to prepare and provide all necessary and proper books for the transaction of the above matter, which said books shall be at all times open to the examination of the county auditor of this county, its board of supervisors, and such persons as may be designated; the said books, on the expiration of said contract, to be by said House deposited with the county auditor, and become the property of the county. All of the matters and things above provided for to be done and performed without expense of any kind to this county; said commission, however, not paying the costs of any suit ordered brought." The plaintiff entered upon the discharge of the duties specified in his agreement with the state and the resolution of the board of supervisors, and between December 1, 1892, and April 30, 1893, by virtue of his appointment and employment, caused to be collected and paid into the county treasury for the use and benefit of Los Angeles county the sum of $3,070.28, to 15 per cent. of which he claims to be entitled, amounting to $460.56, as compensation for his services. He further avers that the state board of examiners allowed him 15 per cent. on the state's portion of the taxes so collected during said period, which has been paid; that his claim for $460.56, duly verified, was presented for allowance to the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles on July 22, 1893, which claim was disallowed by the board, whereupon, and in due time, this action was brought. Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and, defendant refusing to answer, final judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for $460.56 and costs, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

We have searched in vain among the general permanent powers conferred by the county government act upon boards of supervisors, and for other and special authority, either express or implied, under which the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles was authorized to enter into the contract with the respondent involved in the resolution set out in the complaint. Counties are bodies corporate and politic, and have such powers as are specified in, and such other powers as are necessarily implied from the powers conferred by, the act of March 31, 1891, entitled, "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments." St. 1891, p. 295: "Its powers can only be exercised by the board of supervisors, or by agents and officers acting under their authority, or authority of law." Section 2. By the fourth section of the act, it is entitled to: (1) "Sue and be sued." (2) "To purchase and hold land within its limits." (3) "To make such contracts and hold such personal property as may be necessary to the exercise of its powers." (4) "To manage and dispose of its property as the interests of its inhabitants may require." (5) "To levy and collect such taxes, for purposes under its exclusive jurisdiction, as are authorized by law." Among the general permanent powers conferred upon the board of supervisors by the twenty-fifth section of the act are, "under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law:" (1) "To supervise the official conduct of all county officers, and officers of all districts and other subdivisions of the county charged with the assessing, collecting, safekeeping, management or disbursement of the public revenue; see that they faithfully perform their duties, direct prosecution for delinquencies," etc. (13) "To levy taxes upon the taxable property of their respective counties for all county purposes," etc. (17) "To direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party, and to employ counsel to assist the district attorney in conducting the same."

We must bear in mind that all the powers conferred upon the boards of supervisors, whether express or implied, are to be exercised "under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law." Under the power conferred to levy taxes for county purposes, it might be, in the absence of other legislation, plausibly contended that the power to collect the taxes so levied, without which the levy would be of no avail, would be implied as a necessary corollary of the express power conferred. Where, however, a power is conferred by statute, and the mode of its exercise is also prescribed, the mode prescribed is usually held to be the measure of the power. The whole course of proceeding, from the levy of the tax to its collection, is confided to certain officers designated by the statute, whose duties, and the time and manner of their discharge, are specified by the law. The board of supervisors, by virtue of the power conferred upon it, may supervise the official conduct of the officers designated to assess for purposes of taxation, and to collect and disburse the taxes, to the extent of requiring them to faithfully discharge their duties under the law, and direct their prosecution for failure so to do; but the board cannot add to those duties, or relieve the officers from their discharge, as provided by statute. When taxes become delinquent, and real property is sold and purchased by the state for nonpayment thereof, it rests with the latter to determine, at its option, whether or not it will apply for a deed thereof. Like any other purchaser, it may desire a redemption to be had, or it may prefer to become the owner of the property, with a view to a more advantageous disposition. The owner may redeem land so purchased by the state, or not, at his option, at any time before the latter has disposed of it. The board of supervisors has no voice in the matter, and cannot intervene to accelerate or retard a redemption. If a redemption is made by the owner, it can only be by applying to the auditor for an estimate and certificates of the amount due, and by presenting such certificates, with the money specified therein, to the county treasurer, and procuring from the latter receipts showing the payment of such amount, which he must file, etc. Every step in the process is defined, and the officer or person by whom it is to be taken is designated. Nothing is left to the supervisors to do, or to cause to be done, except to see to it that the officers do their duty as it is nominated in the statute. Having no authority to act in the premises, and there being no right given by law to authorize them to appoint an agent who was or could be authorized to act, the attempted appointment by the resolution set out in the complaint was ultra vires, in the extreme sense of the term. What could the respondent possibly do under such an appointment? Simply nothing. He could not collect redemption money, or receipt for it. He could not, as the agent of the county, give notice to the owners of applications on the part of the state to procure deeds to lands purchased by it. This right or duty belonged to the state, and could only be exercised by it. We are of opinion that the board of supervisors, in the absence of positive law authorizing it so to do, cannot, in any case, appoint an agent to exercise powers which it cannot itself exercise. In the exercise of powers conferred upon it, it may appoint agents to discharge ministerial duties not calling for the exercise of reason or discretion, but cannot go beyond this, and delegate to others duties, the discharge of which, calling for the use of reason and discretion, are regarded as public trusts. Scollay v. Butte Co., 67 Cal. 249, 7 Pac. 661. We do not, however, base our decision upon the ground that the duties devolving upon respondent are of such a character as called for the exercise of discretion and judgment, but upon the broader ground that, the statute having confided these duties to the officers specially designated by law for their discharge, the supervisors have no authority, express or implied, in the premises, and hence that the contract was beyond the jurisdiction conferred upon the board. Smith v. Los Angeles Co., 99 Cal. 628, 34 Pac. 439; El Dorado Co. v. Meiss (Cal.) 34 Pac. 716; People v. Johnson, 95 Cal. 472, 31 Pac. 611. The case of Lassen Co. v. Shinn, 88 Cal. 510, 26 Pac. 365, was one in which Shinn and Maston, attorneys at law, were employed by the supervisors to collect from the state moneys due the county of Lassen on account of the keeping by the latter of indigent persons, and the contract for their payment was upheld. The decision went upon the ground that the county being entitled to recover the money, and the board being authorized to appoint attorneys, and the business such as might be supposed to require the services of attorneys, their acts were within the scope of their powers. It will be seen from the foregoing statement that there is a broad distinction between the underlying principle involved in that case and this. Here the board sought to confer powers upon its agent which it did not, and could not be presumed to, possess, because confided to other hands, —to contract for the performance of acts, no one of which could its agent perform, for like reasons. The only reason that can be urged in favor of such appointment must be, we think, that in case of the redemption of property purchased by the state the county becomes entitled to its pro rata share of the money paid, and hence is interested in having property so situated redeemed from the tax sale. The answer to it, if any is required, must be that if the laws which define the methods for redemption in anywise retard the process they should be amended, and that while they exist in their present form the process of redemption cannot be hastened, or rendered more effective, by ignoring them and the ministers designated for their execution.

These views render it unnecessary to pass upon the validity of the contract between respondent and the state comptroller and attorney general. The judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

PEOPLE v. KILVINGTON. (No. 21,033.)

HOMICIDE—BY OFFICER IN MAKING ARREST—EVIDENCE—PROVINCE OF JURY.

1. On indictment of an officer for murder while attempting to make an arrest, where the facts are undisputed, it is for the court to say whether defendant had reasonable ground to believe that deceased had committed a felony.

2. An officer who sees one running at night, pursued by another, shouting, "Stop thief!" has reasonable ground to believe that a felony has been committed.

3. Whether an officer is guilty of criminal negligence in shooting one whom he is attempting to arrest, and who he has reason to believe has committed a felony, is a question for the jury.

4. On indictment of an officer for killing one whom he was attempting to arrest, and who he believed had committed a felony, evidence that deceased was in that locality on lawful business is inadmissible.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

George Kilvington was indicted for murder, and convicted. From a final judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, he appeals.

The defendant, George Kilvington, was informed against by the district attorney of Santa Clara county for the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed at said county on the 3d day of May, 1892, by the felonious killing of one Henry Schmidt. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and adjudged to be punished by imprisonment in the state prison of the state of California, at San Quentin, for the term of seven years. This appeal is from the final judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

It appears that the defendant was night watchman in Chinatown, San Jose, and was, as the court instructed the jury, a police officer of the city of San Jose. On the night of the 3d day of May, 1892, he had been at Chinatown with one Henry Burgess, for the purpose of showing the latter through a cannery. On their return from the cannery, about 9 o'clock in the evening, and when on Taylor street, they heard some one cry, "Stop thief!" two or three times, and upon looking around they observed two men running across a vacant lot or open ground fronting on the street northerly and diagonally to their course, in a direction which, if continued, would have taken them across defendant's line of travel 20 feet or more ahead of defendant and his companion. The two men running were not together, but one was in advance, and the other pursuing him, and crying out, "Stop thief!" according to the testimony of the defendant. The night was dark, but the parties were visible at some distance. Defendant ordered the man in advance to stop, and repeated the order two or three times. The order was not obeyed, but the stranger threw up his hands, when, as defendant claims, he saw something in his hands, and he drew his own pistol and fired, killing the man, who at the time was, say, 30 feet distant. The man fell upon his face, and upon examination proved to be one Henry Schmidt, and he had no weapons upon his person. Defendant did not, so far as appears, recognize deceased before firing the fatal shot, and did not consider himself in danger, but, as he testifies, intended to arrest the deceased, and for the purpose of intimidating and stopping him attempted to shoot over his head, but, the deceased being upon higher ground, about two or three feet, the ball entered his neck. Upon this point the defendant testified: "My object in ordering him to stop was to see why he was running away; what he had done. I thought he was some criminal, some thief, some sneak thief, or something of that kind, that time of night, to see a man running, and another man chasing him, calling, 'Stop thief!' I intended to find out,—to investigate,—and see what it was. I had every cause to believe by the calling of 'Stop thief!' that he was a criminal, and my object was to arrest him. I fired to intimidate him, and I endeavored to shoot over his head. * * * I heard a man call 'Stop thief!' and I couldn't tell whether this man had stolen a loaf of bread or robbed a bank." And in another part of his testimony he said: "For all I know, this man might have committed a murder, or robbed some one. I don't know what he was guilty of. I could not judge. All I know the man was running after another, hollering, 'Stop thief! stop thief!' " The man in pursuit of the deceased was one William H. Howard. The testimony of the latter was lengthy, but may be epitomized as follows: He was passing the house of one Mrs. Hayford, when the deceased ran out of the back yard, and the witness, thinking he was a criminal, pursued him, crying "Stop!" or "Stop thief!" for some distance, with the result as above stated.

Wm. P. Veuve, for appellant. V. A. Scheller and Spencer & Burchard, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. (after stating the facts). There was no conflict in the evidence as to the circumstances under which the defendant killed the deceased, and, in order to determine whether his act was excusable or not, it was necessary for the jury to consider, first, whether the defendant was justified in attempting to arrest the deceased at all; and, if so, whether the act of shooting merely for the purpose of intimidating, and thus causing the deceased to stop, and without any intention of killing or wounding him, was or was not criminal negligence. It was important to the defendant to have these questions, and the law in relation to each, clearly and separately stated to the jury. The court correctly instructed the jury that a peace officer has the right, without a warrant, to arrest any person in the night, when the officer has reasonable ground to believe that such person has committed a felony. Pen. Code, § 836; Burns v. Erben, 40 N. Y. 463. But the court erred in the manner in which it submitted the question of probable cause to the jury. Upon this point the court gave the following instruction: "It is for the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances of the case whether the defendant had reasonable cause to believe that a felony had been committed by the deceased. If you find from the evidence that he had such cause for belief, you will then determine whether, in the attempt to arrest the deceased, he used only such means as were necessary to prevent the escape of the deceased, and to effect his arrest." This instruction submitted to the jury the entire question in reference to the existence of probable cause upon the part of the defendant to arrest the deceased, and that body was called upon, not only to find whether the facts relied upon by the defendant to show such probable cause were true, but also, if true, to determine whether or not they were legally sufficient for that purpose. The instruction was erroneous, as it is not the province of the jury to decide in any case whether the facts and circumstances which they may find established by the evidence are sufficient to constitute probable cause. This principle of law is now settled beyond doubt or controversy, as a reference to a few of many cases which might be cited on that point will show. "This question of probable cause, or reasonable ground for suspicion, whether it arises in actions for malicious prosecution or false imprisonment, is one of law, unless the evidence out of which it arises is conflicting, in which event it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury what facts, if established, will constitute probable cause, and submit to them only the question as to such facts." Burns v. Erben, 40 N. Y. 463; Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 384; Masten v. Deyo, 2 Wend. 425; Pangburn v. Boll, 1 Wend. 345; Driggs v. Burton, 44 Vt. 124; Panton v. Williams, 2 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 169. And the supreme court of this state, in Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 152, in passing upon the same question, said: "The authorities are substantially uniform that the question of probable cause, however presented, is a question of law, and therefore one to be determined by the court. When the facts in reference to the alleged probable cause are admitted or established beyond controversy, then the determination of their legal effect is absolute, and the jury are to be told that there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be. When, however, the facts are controverted and the evidence is conflicting, then the determination of their legal effect by the court is necessarily hypothetical, and the jury are to be told that if they find the facts in a designated way, then that such facts, when so found, do or do not amount to probable cause." The same rule is also announced in Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644; Fulton v. Onesti, 66 Cal. 575, 6 Pac. 491; and in the late case of Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 28 Pac. 937, where the whole question is elaborately discussed.

As already stated, the facts in this case were undisputed, and the court ought, therefore, to have instructed the jury as to their sufficiency in law to justify the defendant in attempting to arrest the deceased; that is, whether they were legally sufficient to induce a reasonable belief in the mind of the defendant that the deceased had committed a felony. The defendant requested the following charges upon this point: "Twelve. The court instructs the jury that, if the defendant saw the deceased running at night, pursued by Howard, and Howard was crying out 'Stop!' or 'Stop thief!' and the deceased, on being ordered to stop by the defendant two or three times, and refusing to do so, but continuing his flight, then the defendant had reasonable cause to believe the defendant [deceased] had committed a felony." "Fourteen. The court instructs the jury that the uncontradicted evidence in this case shows that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe, at the time of the killing, that the deceased had committed a felony." The refusal of these instructions presents the most important question of law arising upon this appeal, as it is manifest that, if either one had been given (the facts recited in the first one being established without any conflict whatever in the evidence), the inquiry of the jury would have been restricted to the single question whether the defendant exercised due care and caution in what he did in attempting to effect the arrest of the deceased; or, stated in another form, the question before the jury would have been, was the shooting in the direction of deceased, for the mere purpose of intimidation, without any intention of killing him, an act of criminal negligence upon the part of the defendant? The refusal of the court to thus narrow the inquiry was clearly prejudicial to the defendant, if, under the undisputed facts, he had, in the judgment of the law, probable cause to arrest the deceased; and this brings us to the consideration of the question, did the defendant, in view of the facts as presented to him at the time, have reasonable or probable cause to believe that the deceased had committed a felony? There is a substantial agreement in the decisions of the courts as to what constitutes probable cause or reasonable cause such as will justify one in arresting or prosecuting another upon a criminal charge; and perhaps as clear and comprehensive a statement of the rule as can be found is that of Shaw, C. J., in Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 217. "There must be such a state of facts," said he, "as would lead a man of ordinary care and prudence to believe, or entertain an honest and strong suspicion, that the person is guilty." Applying this rule to the facts of this case, we think it must be held that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe that the deceased may have committed a felony. It is true, the deceased was not charged in terms with the commission of a felony, but this was not necessary in order to justify the defendant in entertaining a reasonable suspicion that he was guilty of a felony. It was night. The deceased was fleeing, pursued by a person who was shouting, "Stop thief!" This was, in effect, a charge that the deceased had committed a theft of some kind, and the defendant had just as much reason to suspect or believe that the deceased may have committed robbery or burglary or grand larceny as to suppose that his pursuer only meant by the cry of "Stop thief!" to charge him with petit larceny. The defendant was called upon to act promptly, and, as the language used by the witness Howard was broad enough in its popular sense to import a charge of felony, the defendant was justified in attempting to arrest the deceased. An officer who would refuse to arrest a person fleeing and pursued under the circumstances disclosed in this case, because the charge was not more direct and specific as to the commission of a felony, would be justly censurable for a neglect of official duty. In considering this question of probable cause upon the part of the defendant to arrest the deceased, we are to look only at the facts and circumstances presented to him at the time he was required to act. The defendant did not recognize the deceased before he fired, and the fact that the latter was an innocent and respectable citizen, and who may have been fleeing from an assailant, cannot be allowed to affect the question we are now discussing. It is only necessary to add upon this point that, in our opinion, the court ought to have instructed the jury that the defendant had the right, under the circumstances established by the evidence, to arrest the deceased, leaving the jury to determine the further question whether the act of shooting the deceased in attempting to effect such arrest was or was not an act of criminal negligence upon the part of the defendant. This latter is purely a question of fact, and its determination must be left to the sound judgment and discretion of the jury, and in the decision of which question the defendant is entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt arising upon the evidence.

The court also erred in admitting the evidence of the witnesses Schloss and Weissel tending to show that deceased went down to the place near where he was shot on that particular night on lawful business. This fact was wholly irrelevant. The defendant knew nothing of the matter, and did not recognize the deceased at the time of the shooting. Under such circumstances the evidence was wholly irrelevant, as it threw no light whatever upon the question whether the defendant was justified in attempting to arrest the deceased under the circumstances as actually presented to him; nor did it have any bearing upon the question whether or not the defendant was guilty of criminal negligence in shooting the deceased.

The motion of defendant to set aside the information was properly denied, and the court did not err in refusing to give the instructions numbered 2, 3, 15, 18, and 24, requested by the defendant. We do not deem it necessary to notice the other points discussed in the brief of counsel. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

SAN FRANCISCO & FRESNO LAND CO. v. BANBURY, County Treasurer, et al.[1]

(No. 19,370.)

TAX SALE—PURCHASE BY STATE—NOTICE TO REDEEM—VALIDITY—PAYMENT OF FEE.

1. Where the state is the purchaser of land at tax sale, the comptroller and the attorney general have no authority to give notice for the state of an intention to apply for a deed.

2. There being no statutory provision for the disposition of a fee for notice of intention to apply for a deed of lands sold to the state for taxes, it must be taken as the legislative intent that no such fee should be charged.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco & Fresno Land Company against J. Banbury, as treasurer of Los Angeles county, and others, to compel the acceptance of money paid for the redemption of land sold for taxes. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

[1] Reversed in banc. See 39 Pac. 439, 106 Cal. 129.

HARRISON, J. In June, 1892, the plaintiff, as the owner and successor in interest of 67 lots of land in McPherson's addition to the town of McPherson, formerly in the county of Los Angeles, but now in the county of Orange, sought to redeem them from a sale for delinquent taxes, made to the state of California March 12, 1889, and for that purpose tendered to the defendant Banbury, as treasurer of the county of Los Angeles, the sum of $225.60. It is conceded that this amount of money was sufficient to effect the redemption, unless the sum of $3 for each lot, amounting to $201, for giving the notice of an intention to apply for a deed and the affidavit therefor, fixed as a fee for giving such notice by section 3785 of the Political Code, should also have been tendered. The county auditor, in his estimate of the amount to be paid for redemption, included this item in the certificates issued by him under the provision of section 3817, Pol. Code, and the treasurer refused to accept the amount tendered, or to give to the plaintiff the certificates named in said section. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action to compel the treasurer to accept the sum tendered as above, and to give to it the triplicate receipts prescribed by the aforesaid section 3817. The cause was tried in the court below and judgment rendered for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

Several questions are discussed in the briefs of counsel, but the conclusion which we have reached upon one of these questions renders it unnecessary to determine the others. In May, 1892, the defendant House, acting under the direction of the state comptroller, gave the notices referred to in section 3785, Pol. Code, and filed his affidavit thereof with the tax collector of Los Angeles county. These several notices were signed, "State of California, by R. F. House, Agent," and in the affidavit of service filed with the tax collector House stated that he was the "agent for the purchaser of the property described in the foregoing notice." House also testified at the trial that prior to the date of giving the notice "he had been appointed by the state of California, through the state comptroller and attorney general, and was authorized to serve notices to cause the redemption of property sold to the state for taxes." The question here presented is not the right of the state to the issuance of a deed, but the right of the delinquent taxpayer to redeem the land struck off to the state under the provisions of section 3773 of the Political Code, and this right depends upon his compliance with the requirements of the statute in that behalf, the particular questions here presented being whether there was a tender of a sufficient amount of money to effect the redemption. It is insisted by the defendants that the plaintiff, in addition to the amount tendered by it, should have also tendered $3 for each of the notices given by House, amounting to $201 in all; while the plaintiff insists that the notice given by House was without authority of law, and consequently that the item of $3 for giving such notice was not a part of the "costs and expenses of the redemption." Section 3817 of the Political Code provides that, when the state has become the purchaser of land sold for delinquent taxes, the person whose estate has been sold, or his successor in interest, may redeem the same by paying the amount of taxes due thereon at the time of the sale, with interest thereon, and any other taxes then delinquent thereon, together with a sum of money equivalent to the taxes that would have been subsequently assessed; "and also all costs and expenses, and 25 per cent. penalty which may have accrued by reason of such delinquency and sale, and the costs and expenses of such redemption." Unless the item of three dollars for giving the notice is a part of the "costs and expenses" which have accrued "by reason of the delinquency and sale," the plaintiff was under no obligation to tender it to the treasurer in order to effect a redemption from the sale. Section 3785 makes provision for the issuance of a deed to the purchaser in case there is no redemption from the tax sale, and requires that before making application for a deed the "purchaser" must serve upon the owner of the property purchased a written notice, containing certain statements, and that for the service of said notice and making an affidavit thereof the "purchaser" shall be entitled to receive the sum of three dollars, "which sum of three dollars shall be paid by the redemptioner at the same time and in the same manner as other costs, percentages, penalties, and fees are paid." The notice thus required is to be served by the purchaser, or by some one in his behalf, whom he has authorized to serve it. Such notice, served by a stranger, without any authority from the purchaser, would not satisfy the requirements of the statute, or entitle the purchaser to insist upon a payment or tender of the three dollars, in order that a redemption might be effected; and the rule in this respect is the same whether the state or an individual is the purchaser. The state can act only through officers or agents, and the duties of its officers or agents must be defined by statute, and the officer or agent who would give this notice must show his authority therefor under some statute. We have not been cited to any statute which confers upon either the comptroller or attorney general the right to appoint an agent for the purpose of giving this notice, or to take any step in reference to the issuance of a deed to the state for the property which may be struck off to it under the provisions of section 3775 of the Political Code. The duties of each of the above-named officers are defined in the Political Code,—those of the comptroller in sections 433 to 444, and those of the attorney general in sections 470 to 475,—and in neither of these sections can there be found any authority for either of these officers to give the above notices, or for the appointment of an agent to give the notices in behalf of the state. The provision in section 433, making it the duty of the comptroller "to superintend the fiscal concerns of the state," only designates him as the accountant of the state's finances, and does not give to him any function recognizing the same until the money over which he is to exercise a supervision or control has come into the hands of the treasurer, or some fiscal agent of the state, or has become an obligation in favor of the state, for which the state is entitled to an immediate enforcement. The duty imposed upon this officer by virtue of subdivision 16 of this section, "to direct and superintend the collection of all moneys due the state, and institute suits in its name for all official delinquencies in relation to the assessment, collection, and payment of the revenue," arises only when the moneys thus to be collected are "due the state," and after there has been some official delinquency in relation to the collection or payment of the revenue. But, if the state has become the purchaser of land at a delinquent tax sale, the tax has been extinguished by the sale, and the state, instead of being a creditor of the taxpayer, or entitled to receive any money due to it for taxes, has acquired an interest in the land, which is to be divested only by some affirmative action on the part of the delinquent taxpayer. The care and direction of the state's interest in land would naturally fall to the department of the surveyor general; but, whether that officer has been intrusted with any function in reference to the lands purchased at a delinquent tax sale, or whether the state has failed to make any provision in reference thereto, it is clear that neither the comptroller nor the attorney general has been intrusted with the duty of guarding the state's interest therein.

It is not the policy of the state to increase the burdens of taxation beyond the necessary cost of collection, or to impose any greater burdens in a redemption from a delinquent tax sale than is necessary to secure the payment of the original tax. All matters of taxation are resolved in favor of the taxpayer, and express statutes should be found for each item of cost to be imposed upon him. There is no provision of law for the disposition of the three dollars claimed herein as a fee for giving the notice. Neither the comptroller nor the attorney general is entitled to it as a fee, or as a compensation for any official duty; nor, if the state is entitled to receive it, are they authorized to give it to any agent they may select for the purpose of serving the notice. Section 3816 provides that "the original tax and the twenty-five per cent. and interest paid in redemption shall be apportioned between the state and county in the same proportion that the state tax bears to the county tax," and then declares, "the moneys received for delinquencies shall be paid to the county," and makes no provision for the disposition of this item. If the legislature had intended that the state, like any other purchaser, should be entitled to charge and receive this item of three dollars, it would have made some provision that it should be paid to it out of the redemption money, and not that it should be paid to the county. We are of the opinion that the amount tendered by the plaintiff was sufficient for the purpose of redeeming the lands in question, and that the treasurer should have received the money, and issued to it the certificates authorized by the statute. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

RANDALL v. DUFF et al. (No. 15,718.)

APPEALABLE ORDER—DISMISSAL.

1. An order of the trial court ordering judgment to be entered as directed by the supreme court, and the judgment as modified, are appealable.

2. An appeal cannot be dismissed, on motion, on the ground that it is frivolous, as the record must be examined to determine its merit.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by A. W. Randall against Julia K. Duff and others. From an order modifying the judgment as ordered by the supreme court, and from the judgment as modified, plaintiff appealed. Defendants move to dismiss the appeal. Denied.

S. M. Buck and W. C. Belcher, for appellant. W. L. Duff, H. S. Foote, and L. D. McKisick, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss the appeal herein on the following grounds: "(1) That the action of the lower court in modifying the judgment or decree in said action, as directed by the supreme court, was a ministerial act only, and one in which the lower court had no jurisdiction, and is not an act or order from which an appeal will lie. "(2) That the judgment or decree rendered in said action on the 3d day of June, 1892, and modified as directed by the supreme court on the 3d day of March, 1894, by the superior court, is a final judgment in said action, already approved and passed upon by the supreme court as a final determination of said action, and no further appeal lies therefrom. That the so-called order from which plaintiff has appealed is not an appealable order." When this case was last here on appeal (101 Cal. 82, 35 Pac. 440), the judgment of the court below was "affirmed in all respects, except as to the matter of interest, as to which the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded to the superior court, with direction to amend its decree by allowing interest to the plaintiff down to March 1, 1892, and by reducing the judgment against him correspondingly." The present appeal is taken from the order of the court below modifying the judgment as to the matter of interest, and from the judgment as modified. It may be true, as claimed, that the order and judgment appealed from were made and amended as directed by this court, and that the appeal is frivolous and vexatious, and was taken merely for the purpose of delay; but that is a matter which can only be determined by an examination of the record on appeal, and this, we have held will not be done on a motion to dismiss an appeal. In People v. McNulty, 95 Cal. 594, 30 Pac. 963, it was held that to dismiss an appeal "upon the ground that it is frivolous is to refuse to consider its merits, and therefore there can be no dismissal of an appeal on the ground that it is without merit, for to reach this conclusion the merits must be considered and the record must be examined." To the same effect is Howell v. Howell, 101 Cal. 115, 35 Pac. 443. As the order modifying the judgment and the judgment as amended are both appealable, it follows that the motion to dismiss the appeal herein should be denied. So ordered.

DE HAVEN, J., being disqualified, did not participate.

HUMPHREYS v. BLASINGAME. (No. 18,256.)

RIGHT OF WAY—ACQUIREMENT BY PRESCRIPTION—EVIDENCE—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

1. Plaintiff owned two tracts of land, separated by land of defendant. For five years before defendant purchased the land, plaintiff had used a road over it, connecting his tracts, and continued to do so for eight years thereafter, without asking defendant's permission, and without opposition on his part. Held, that the evidence sustained a finding that plaintiff had used the road under a claim of right, and not by permission of defendant, so as to perfect his easement by occupancy.

2. On an issue as to whether plaintiff had acquired a right of way over defendant's land by five years' use thereof, the deeds under which each holds are competent evidence to show the ownership of the tracts of land involved, and the dates of transfer.

3. Payment of taxes is not necessary to enable one to acquire title to a right of way which is not assessed separately from the land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. C. Humphreys against A. A. Blasingame. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Sayle & Coldwell, for appellant. C. C. Merriam, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Plaintiff is the owner of about five acres of land, upon which he resides, and is also the owner of 160 acres separated from the residence parcel by intervening lands of the defendant, over which the plaintiff claims a right of way between his two parcels. The defendant having denied the plaintiff's right, and closed up the way, this action is brought to establish plaintiff's right, and to recover damages, and for an injunction. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the plaintiff had findings and judgment, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

The court found that plaintiff had been for 13 years and more the owner of the parcel mentioned, and that defendant, for a period of 8 years, had been the owner of said intervening land. The fourth finding is as follows: "That, for the period of thirteen years and upwards, plaintiff and his grantors have, under claim of right, continuously and adversely to all the world, and uninterruptedly, held, had, and used said right of way, and a certain roadway along the right of way above described, for travel by wagon and team, and of sufficient and ample width for such purpose." Other findings describe the way by courses and distances; that plaintiff is the owner of it; the interruption of the use by defendant; that plaintiff has sustained damage in the sum of five dollars; and that the acts of defendant prevent the use of plaintiff's larger tract. The findings are attacked upon the ground that they are not justified by the evidence.

Plaintiff had occupied his 5-acre lot for 17 years, and became the owner of the 160-acre tract about four years later, and used the way in controversy during all the time since becoming the owner of the latter tract. The 160-acre tract was patented by the United States to William Lowery in 1876, and from that time, if not before, the way in question was used by its owner. Defendant's land was acquired from the government by one Pitman, who afterwards sold and conveyed to E. T. Lowery, the brother of William; and this way was used during the ownership of Pitman and Lowery, and when defendant became the owner. Appellant insists that plaintiff used the way without any claim of right, and was permitted to do so by the defendant as a matter of neighborly accommodation, and that the way was one used by the defendant and his predecessors for the uses of the land now owned by defendant. There is no conflict in the testimony, as given by the witnesses, as to the facts of the use. It is with the facts inferred from the use under the circumstances detailed by the witnesses that appellant finds fault. But these inferred facts are as fully within the domain of the jury, or of the court sitting without a jury, as the facts from which they are inferred. The plaintiff testified that he found the way in existence when he bought the five acres; that the way passed by defendant's house, and that portion of it between defendant's house and the Toll-House road was used by defendant and others, and that he supposed he had a right of way through there; that he used it from the time he acquired the 160 acres, to haul wood and hay and his farming implements, whenever he had occasion; that the fact that he owned the 160 acres, and that the road had always been there, gave him the right; that the right was never questioned until defendant closed the gate the preceding December; and that he never had occasion to tell defendant, until then, that he had such right, because the question never came up between them. In Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 460, 12 Pac. 491, it is said: "To perfect an easement by occupancy for five years, the enjoyment must be adverse, continuous, open, peaceable. It must be adverse, and under claim of legal right so to do, and not by the consent, permission, or indulgence, merely, of the owner of the alleged servient estate. This is quite obvious in cases where the consent, permission, or license is expressly given. But it is no less true where the permission or license is implied, as it may well be from the facts and circumstances under which the use was enjoyed. The question is one for the jury, or for the court sitting as such, to determine as a fact, in the light of the relations between the parties, and all the surrounding circumstances." We think the evidence sufficient to support the finding that the way was used by plaintiff for more than the statutory period under a claim of right, and that the use was not merely permissive. He had used it five years or more before defendant acquired the property, and was so using it when defendant acquired it. The use could not, therefore, have originated in defendant's permission, either express or implied; and the fact that defendant made no objection, nor any inquiry as to plaintiff's right, is quite as significant of an admission of such right as it is of a mere permissive use, while the fact that plaintiff never asked permission to use the way is at least suggestive of a claim of right to use it. Other circumstances might be referred to which tend to strengthen the conclusion reached by the learned judge, but, as we see no ground upon which his finding can be set aside, it is not necessary to do so.

Several exceptions were taken to the admission and exclusion of evidence.

The ownership of the different parcels of land involved, and the dates of transfer, were material, and the deeds were competent evidence as to each of those facts.

The other exceptions related to the possibility or impossibility of reaching plaintiff's 160-acre tract otherwise than over the way claimed, the difficulties to be encountered, the distance, and other matters of like character. We think the evidence given by plaintiff upon these questions tended to shed light upon the question of plaintiff's claim to a right of way, though it seems to have been supposed by plaintiff that the difficulties of reaching his land by any other route were such as gave him a right of way of necessity across defendant's land, rather than a right by prescription. That he was mistaken upon a question of law does not affect the fact that he claimed a right to cross defendant's land by a road which he found in existence when he purchased the 160-acre tract. But, however that may be, if these rulings had been in favor of defendant, it could not have changed any finding or the result of the case; and therefore, if it be conceded that the court erred, the defendant was not prejudiced.

Counsel for appellant cites cases to the point that plaintiff's possession must have been hostile, and that such hostile possession must have amounted to an ouster of defendant. Plaintiff's use of the way under a claim of right was necessarily hostile, but it need not amount to an ouster or exclusion of the defendant from a right to use the way. The use of the way, if without right, is a trespass, which would have given the defendant a right of action; and that is all that is necessary to set the statute running, so far as a right of action is concerned. Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 303; Ditch Co. v. Crane, 80 Cal. 183, 22 Pac. 76; Sullivan v. Zeiner, 98 Cal. 347, 33 Pac. 209. So the payment of taxes is necessary to the successful assertion of title by adverse possession, as provided now by statute; but that requirement does not apply to a mere easement, which is not separately assessed for the purposes of taxation.

It is further contended by appellant that the judgment is too broad, because it includes the right to use the way for driving over it cattle, sheep, and other stock; and, as respondent does not seriously object to this contention, the judgment should be modified in this respect.

We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed; that the judgment be modified so as to exclude the right of the plaintiff to use the way for driving cattle, sheep, hogs, or other stock, in herds, bands, droves, or when loose and not under control, and, as thus modified, it be affirmed, and that the costs of this appeal be taxed to appellant.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be modified so as to conform to the said opinion, and that as modified the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed, at the cost of appellant.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1894.)

DIVORCE—ALIMONY—PRINTING AND COUNSEL FEES.

1. An order by the judge who tried a divorce case, granting $100 printer's fees and $250 counsel fee on a pending appeal from a judgment in favor of the wife, and a contemplated appeal from an order denying a new trial, will not be reversed as excessive.

2. In an action for divorce, an order granting a counsel fee for an appeal from an order denying a new trial, made before such appeal is taken, will not be reversed as premature where, on the hearing of the appeal from the order granting such allowance, it appears that an appeal from the order denying a new trial is pending.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action for divorce by Lillie Wolff against Henry Wolff. From an order granting an allowance for counsel fees and disbursements, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fox & Kellogg, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes (W. W. Foote, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order made after judgment in a divorce case allowing alimony. The affidavit, among other things, states that the case has been tried, and judgment rendered for plaintiff; that an appeal had already been taken from the judgment, and a motion for a new trial had been made and denied; and that defendant contemplated an appeal from such order. Thereupon, the court allowed as alimony for the two appeals: For printing, $100; for counsel fees, $250. The affidavit also shows that, although alimony had been previously allowed to the amount of $1,700, only $250 had been paid; that plaintiff was destitute of means. It is contended that the allowance is excessive, but we cannot so conclude. The judge who made the order had tried the case, and was fully aware of the nature of the controversy. How much printing would be required would depend upon this. It would have been more prudent to forbear making an allowance for the second appeal until after it had been taken, but our records show that the appeal from the order denying a new trial was taken afterwards. We do not think the order should be reversed because the provision for this was premature. The order is affirmed.

WALLACE v. McKENZIE et al. (No. 18,275.)

MORTGAGES—PRIORITIES.

Where a mortgage on land is made under an express oral agreement that it shall be subject to one to be given to D., the fact that it is recorded before the mortgage to D. will not, in equity, destroy the priority of the latter as between the immediate parties.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Miles Wallace, assignee in insolvency of John Krohn, against McKenzie, Rule, and Dickey, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant Dickey, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stuart S. Wright and J. P. Meux, for appellant. Frank H. Short, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff, Wallace, as assignee in insolvency of one John Krohn, brought this action to foreclose a mortgage executed to said Krohn by defendants McKenzie and Rule. Dickey was made a defendant upon averment that he claimed some interest in the mortgaged premises which is alleged to be subsequent and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. Dickey, by answer and cross complaint, set up that he had a mortgage on said premises, executed by said McKenzie and Rule, which was prior and superior to the mortgage of plaintiff. The court found in favor of Dickey, holding plaintiff's mortgage to be second, and subject to that of Dickey. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The fact are substantially these: A few days prior to the execution of either of the mortgages, Krohn, who was a creditor of McKenzie and Rule, requested the latter to give him a mortgage to secure the amount owing by them to him; and they informed him that they would do so if he would accept the same as a second mortgage subject to one which they had given, or were about to give, to Dickey. To this Krohn assented. A mortgage which had been prepared by or for Dickey, who lived at Fresno, and forwarded to McKenzie and Rule, who lived near a place called Coarse Gold, was signed by the latter on or about November 8, 1889. On November 9th the mortgage to Krohn was drawn up by a notary at Coarse Gold,—being substantially copied, except as to amounts, etc., from the mortgage to Dickey,—and both mortgages were on said day acknowledged before said notary, the one to Dickey being acknowledged first. Krohn took his mortgage (the one sued on in this action) "with the express understanding and agreement that he would take and receive the same subsequent and subject to the Dickey mortgage, which, it was expressly understood and agreed, was and should be the first upon said premises." McKenzie and Rule "refused to execute a first mortgage of said premises to said Krohn" and "would never have delivered the mortgage to him, except that the said Krohn agreed to receive and did receive the same as a second mortgage upon said premises, and subject to the said mortgage of the said Dickey." Krohn had his mortgage recorded immediately. Dickey's mortgage was sent to him at Fresno the next day by mail, and was not recorded until several days afterwards. We think that under these circumstances the court below correctly held that the mortgage of plaintiff should be treated in equity as second and subject to the mortgage of defendant Dickey. Plaintiff stands in the shoes of Krohn, and there is no question of innocent holders without notice to be considered. Therefore, authorities cited by appellant which deal with the rights of third parties do not here apply. It seems that when Dickey received his mortgage he sent it back for some corrections, but it does not appear that any alterations were made, and it does appear that no material alteration was made. It dces appear that the notary, for some reason, changed the date of the acknowledgment; but that, in any view, is immaterial, for as Krohn had full knowledge of the existence of Dickey's mortgage, and expressly agreed to take his subject to it, it is unimportant whether or not the mortgage was properly recorded. Judgment and order affirmed.

LOS ANGELES, P. & G. RY. CO. v. RUMP. (No. 19,374.)

CONDEMNATION BY RAILROAD COMPANY — RIGHT OF WAY — SUCCESSIVE TRIALS — TAXATION OF COSTS—SATISFACTION OF JUDGMENT — EFFECT—EVIDENCE—DAMAGES.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1254, which provides that where, after an award in condemnation proceedings, a new trial is granted the owner, and he fails on such trial to obtain a greater compensation than on the first, the costs of the new trial shall be taxed against him, does not violate Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1254, provides that if, after the judgment in condemnation proceedings, plaintiff wishes to take possession, it must pay into court the full amount of the judgment; that defendant, upon filing an abandonment of all defenses except as to the amount of damages on a new trial, shall be entitled to receive the amount of the judgment; and that the receipt of such amount shall be held to be an abandonment by defendant of all defenses excepting his claim for greater compensation. Held, that where defendant has filed an abandonment, and received the amount of the judgment, the only issue on a new trial is whether he is entitled to greater compensation; and, if the award is for a smaller amount, plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment against him for the difference.

3. In condemnation proceedings by a railroad company, defendant will not be allowed on a second trial to show the comparative value of her property before and after the construction of the railroad, which took place after the first and before the second trial.

4. In condemnation proceedings by a railroad company, evidence will not be received of the cost of maintaining a fence along plaintiff's right of way, as the cost thereof is not an element of damage, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1248, providing that, if the property sought to be condemned be for a railroad, "the cost of good and sufficient fences" along the line of such railroad must be assessed as damages.

5. Defendant's motion to strike out the testimony of one of plaintiff's witnesses that "the railroad would prevent any further wash, and it affords a good embankment to protect the balance of the property," was denied. Held, that an instruction that "the compensation to be awarded * * * must be ascertained without respect to any benefits that would accrue to the remainder of the land from the building of the railroad" was sufficient to remove any prejudice to the defendant from the refusal to strike out.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles, Pasadena & Glendale Railway Company against Minnie Rump to condemn a right of way. Judgment was rendered for defendant for a smaller amount than on a former trial, and she appeals. Modified.

P. W. Dooner, for appellant. Burnett & Gibson, for appellee.

HAYNES, C. Action to condemn a right of way over appellant's premises. Upon the first trial of this action by a judgment entered October 6, 1890, damages were awarded the defendant, Minnie Rump, as follows: Value of land taken, $75; cost of fencing, $100; damage by severance, $600; total, $775 and costs. The plaintiff paid the damages into court, and took possession and constructed its road. The defendant received the money so paid, and, having filed her abandonment of all defenses to the action except her claim to a greater compensation, moved for a new trial, and her motion having been denied, appealed to this court, and the judgment and order were upon such appeal reversed in May, 1892, upon the ground that the cost of fencing, as found, was against the evidence. 94 Cal. 432. In December, 1892, a second trial was had, and the damages awarded were as follows: Value of land taken, $106.43; cost of fencing, $125; damage by severance, $300,—total damages awarded, $531.43. Upon this state of the case the court entered a judgment by which the defendant was required to refund to the plaintiff the difference between the award of damages upon the two trials, amounting to $243.57, less the amount of costs awarded to her upon the first trial, amounting, with interest, to $177.57 (the same not having been paid); thus giving judgment against her for $66 and the costs of the second trial, amounting to $224.20, or a total of $290.20. Defendant thereupon moved for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from said judgment and the order denying her said motion.

1. Appellant contends that the court erred in awarding costs to the plaintiff upon the second trial, notwithstanding the damages or compensation awarded her was less than that given upon the first trial, and which had been paid by plaintiff and received by her. Section 1254, Code Civ. Proc., after providing for an appeal to the supreme court in a condemnation proceeding, further provides: "In all cases where a new trial has been granted upon the application of the defendant, and he has failed upon such trial to obtain a greater compensation than was allowed him upon the first trial, the costs of such new trial shall be taxed against him." This provision appellant insists is unconstitutional. We are not cited to any case in this state where that question has been considered. Section 1255, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, in proceedings to condemn property for public use, "costs may be allowed or not, and if allowed may be apportioned between the parties on the same or adverse sides in the discretion of the court." In San Francisco v. Collins, 98 Cal. 262, 33 Pac. 56, it was held that section 1255 is limited by section 14 of article 1 of the constitution,[1] and that the payment of any part of the costs of the plaintiff in that case by the defendant would reduce the just compensation awarded by the jury by a sum equal to the costs so paid. The costs in controversy in that case, however, were not costs resulting from a second trial procured by the defendant for the purpose of securing larger compensation, but which resulted in a verdict for a less sum than that awarded upon the first trial. In Lewis on Eminent Domain (section 562) it is said: "Where the owner is dissatisfied with the amount of damages awarded him in the first instance, and takes an appeal or other proceedings to have a reassessment of the damages, it is usual to provide that he shall pay the costs of the appeal if he fails to secure an increase of damages, and such provisions are proper and valid." In Metler v. Railroad Co., 37 N. J. Law, 222, a similar statute was considered. At page 227 the court said: "The legal effect of these provisions is this: A verdict on a valuation greater than that of the commissioners will entitle the owner to costs, without regard to which party appeals. If the company is the appealing party, and the valuation of the jury is the same or a less sum than that of the commissioners, neither party is entitled to costs. But if the owner is the appealing party, and the jury finds the same or a less sum than the commissioners awarded, he must pay the costs. In that event he must pay the costs, because he has taken an unsuccessful appeal."

[1] Provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation having been made to or paid into court for the owner.

Appellant's argument is, in effect, that her property cannot be taken without just and full compensation; that, if the award of $531.43 upon the second trial must be regarded as the just compensation to which she is entitled, she practically receives but $307.23, if she is required to pay the costs of the second trial, which amount to $224.20; or, if the first award remains as the measure of her compensation, she does not realize that sum by the amount of costs taxed against her. The result of the second trial, however, shows that the first award, if not more than she was entitled to, was at least just and full compensation; and, that sum having been paid by the railroad company and received by her, she cannot complain if the costs of an unsuccessful effort to obtain greater compensation are taxed against her.

2. Appellant contends, further, that she was improperly required to refund to the railroad company the difference between the first and second awards, amounting to $243.57. If appellant's second point can be sustained, the correctness of our conclusion upon the first point is placed beyond question. Upon this point, also, we are without any precedent in this state, and its solution must depend upon the construction of the Code provisions governing proceedings in such cases. But for the provisions of the Code now to be noticed, we would be inclined to hold that plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of the reduction made upon the second trial. In such case, however, the plaintiff should be charged with all costs, since it would litigate upon an equality with the defendant; and if the damages are set at large by the appeal, and remain undetermined until the final trial, the constitutional requirement that defendant shall receive full compensation cannot be complied with if the defendant is required to pay any part of the costs incurred in reaching such final determination. Section 1254, Code Civ. Proc., requires the plaintiff, if he would take possession and use the property for the purpose intended, to pay into court for the defendant the full amount of the judgment, and such further sum as may be required by the court as a fund to pay any further damages and costs that may be recovered in said proceeding. Said section further provides: "The defendant, who is entitled to the money paid into court for him upon any judgment, shall be entitled to demand and receive the same at any time thereafter upon obtaining an order therefor from the court. It shall be the duty of the court, or a judge thereof, upon application being made by such defendant, to order and direct that the money so paid into court for him be delivered to him upon his filing a satisfaction of the judgment, or upon his filing a receipt therefor, and an abandonment of all defenses to the action or proceeding, except as to the amount of damages he may be entitled to in the event that a new trial shall be granted. A payment to a defendant as aforesaid shall be held to be an abandonment by such defendant of all defenses interposed by him, excepting his claim for greater compensation." In this case the condemnation money was paid into court by the plaintiff, and paid over to defendant, who filed her abandonment of all defenses except "her claim for greater compensation;" and the plaintiff took possession of the premises condemned, and constructed its road over the same. The payment of the money into court by the plaintiff was not accompanied by a motion for a new trial or notice of appeal or other objection to the amount found by the jury. It paid its money, and took possession of the land condemned. Under the statute, the defendant received the money without prejudice to any proceeding authorized by it to recover greater compensation, but under a condition that plaintiff's right to occupy the land shall not be questioned. Upon payment of the money, plaintiff acquired a vested right in the property, and the defendant a vested right in the compensation. City of Chicago v. Barbian, 80 Ill. 485, 486; Stacy v. Railroad Co., 27 Vt. 44. The abandonment by the defendant of all defenses except her claim for greater compensation confirmed plaintiff's right to the property, and estopped her from denying that right; and the plaintiff, we think, is equally estopped to say that the money received by the defendant is not hers.

It is urged, however, that the appeal from the first judgment vacated it, and with it the finding of the compensation awarded to the defendant. But, if that were true, the plaintiff's right to the possession was swept away with the defendant's right to the compensation. Plaintiff's right to possession, depending, as it does, under the constitution, upon compensation first made, cannot exist without it. It is therefore clear that the appeal of defendant, accompanied by her abandonment of other defenses, did not, as in ordinary cases, vacate the judgment. Nothing that was in issue upon the first trial was in issue upon the second. The sole questions were whether the defendant was entitled to "greater compensation," and, if so, how much additional compensation was she entitled to? The statute requires the court to pay to the defendant the damages awarded by the jury so deposited by the plaintiff, but makes no provision or requirement that any part of it under any circumstances shall be repaid. Under a statute of the state of New York containing a similar provision for the payment or deposit of the compensation for the land, etc., an appeal is provided for, and on such appeal a new appraisal may be ordered by the same or new commissioners, the second report to be final and conclusive on all the parties. The statute then provides: "If the amount of the compensation to be paid by the company is increased by the second report the difference shall be a lien on the land appraised, and shall be paid by the company to the parties entitled to the same, or deposited in the bank, as the court shall direct; and if the amount is diminished the difference shall be refunded to the company by the party to whom the same may have been paid, and judgment therefor may be rendered by the court, on the filing of the second report, against the party liable to pay the same." 3 Rev. St. N. Y. (8th Ed.) p. 1745, § 18. Under the above statute, not only is the whole question of compensation set at large by the order for a new appraisement, but, if the amount is reduced, there is an express requirement that it shall be repaid, and express authority given the court to render a judgment therefor based upon the report of the commissioners; while under our statute we find no requirement that anything shall be refunded, nor any authority given the court to render a judgment for its repayment. If the defendant had not waived all other defenses, the money deposited would have remained under the control of the court, and "be applied to the payment of the money assessed, and the remainder, if any there be, shall be returned to the plaintiff," as provided in section 1257, Code Civ. Proc. We do not see that our conclusion does any injustice to the plaintiff. By the payment, without any effort to have a reassessment of damages, it assented that the amount assessed was the just compensation required by the constitution, and cannot therefore complain; and the court having paid it to the defendant, in obedience to the statute, we do not see how it can again assume control over it, or direct to what purpose the defendant shall apply it, in the absence of a statute authorizing it, the proceeding being purely statutory.

Some exceptions to evidence remain to be noticed. Defendant's property was mainly used for picnic purposes. Two years intervened between the first and second trial, and defendant sought to show the comparative value of the use of her property before and after the construction of the road. Plaintiff's objection was properly sustained. See Railroad Co. v. Galgiani, 49 Cal. 140, where the reasons for the exclusion of such evidence are clearly stated.

Appellant also contends that the court erred in not permitting a witness called for the plaintiff to testify upon cross-examination as to the cost of maintaining a fence along the plaintiff's right of way through defendant's land. Section 1248, Code Civ. Proc., relates to the assessment of damages. Subdivision 4 provides: "If the property sought to be condemned be for a railroad, the cost of good and sufficient fences along the line of such railroad, and the cost of cattle-guards where fences may cross the line of such railroad." By this section, compensation must be assessed for each source of damage separately; and by section 1251, Id., the plaintiff, instead of paying into court the amount assessed as the cost of erecting the fences, may give bond in double the amount so assessed that it will build the fences within the time specified in the statute. By these provisions it would seem that the cost of maintaining the fences after their erection is not regarded as a distinct subject of damage under these proceedings. The Civil Code (section 485) provides that "railroad corporations must make and maintain a good and sufficient fence on either or both sides of their track and property. * * * Railroad corporations paying to the owner of the land through or along which their road is located an agreed price for making and maintaining such fence, or paying the cost of such fence with the award of damages allowed for the right-of-way for such railroad, are relieved and exonerated from all claims for damages arising out of the killing or maiming any animals or persons who thus fail to construct and maintain such fence. * * *" It would therefore seem by the express language of the above-cited section of the Civil Code, as well as by subdivision 4 of section 1248, Code Civ. Proc., that, where the railroad company pays the cost of good and sufficient fences "with the award of damages allowed for the right-of-way," the duty of maintaining the fence is upon the owner, and the expense of doing so is included in the damages allowed for the right of way.

A witness for the plaintiff, having testified that defendant's land would not be damaged by the construction and operation of plaintiff's road, was asked to give his reason therefor, and in reply said "that the railroad would prevent any further wash, and it affords a good embankment to protect the balance of the property." Defendant's motion to strike out the answer was denied. It may be conceded that the answer of the witness tended to show that the construction of the road would be a benefit to the remainder of the land, but the court, in its instructions to the jury, expressly charged that "the compensation to be awarded the owner must be ascertained without respect to any benefits that would accrue to the remainder of the land from the building of the road." This was an instruction to disregard all testimony tending to show benefits resulting to the remaining land, including that asked to be stricken out, and, we think, was sufficient to remove any prejudice to the defendant from the refusal to strike out.

The only errors being those committed in rendering the judgment, these may be corrected by a modification of it without a new trial. The costs of the first trial, taxed against the plaintiff and remaining unpaid, together with interest thereon, and the costs of this appeal, also taxed to the plaintiff, together with the costs of the former appeal, if unpaid, should be set off against the costs of the second trial, taxed to defendant, so far as they will compensate each other, and a judgment entered in favor of the party in whose favor the balance may be for the excess, leaving in defendant's hands the amount of the first assessment of damages which was paid over to her by the court, pursuant to the statute.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the order denying a new trial be affirmed, and that the judgment appealed from be modified so as to conform to said opinion.

In re ASBILL et al. (No. 21,086.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1894.)

GAME LAW—INDICTMENT FOR VIOLATION—SUFFICIENCY.

An ordinance passed by the board of supervisors of Humboldt county makes it a misdemeanor to kill a female deer at any time, or to have in one's possession, at a time when it is unlawful to kill deer in said county, any deer skins from which the evidence of sex has been removed. Held, that an information stating that the accused "did willfully and unlawfully have in their possession deer skins," without stating that the evidence of sex had been removed, did not charge an offense under the ordinance.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Habeas corpus by P. Asbill, David Mackey, and Lancaster Lupton, convicted and imprisoned for violating a game ordinance, against T. M. Brown, sheriff of Humboldt county. Granted.

Cooper & Hill and Henley, Costello & Dimond, for petitioners. W. H. H. Hart, T. H. Selvage, and F. P. Deering, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Petitioners were found guilty by a justice's court, in the county of Humboldt, of a misdemeanor, and were sentenced to pay a fine of $100 each, or be imprisoned, etc. The offense charged was for the violation of an ordinance passed by the board of supervisors of that county for the protection of game. The charging part of the complaint upon which they were tried is as follows: "That said [naming the defendants] on the 20th day of December, 1893, at Cooper's ranch, in the said county of Humboldt, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully have in their possession deer skins." The judgment followed the language above quoted. The defendants refused to pay the fine imposed, and were committed to jail, and now petition this court to be discharged on habeas corpus.

Petitioners contend that no offense is charged under the ordinance, and that the ordinance is unconstitutional. The complaint was made under section 10 of the ordinance, but a proper construction of that section requires the light of other sections. Sections 5, 6, 7, 9, and 10 are as follows:

"(5) Every person who, in the county of Humboldt, shall within the two years next (except from July 15 to October 15, in each year) after the passage of this ordinance, hunt, pursue, take, kill or destroy any male deer, elk, antelope, mountain sheep or buck shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

"(6) Every person who, in the county of Humboldt, shall at any time hunt, pursue, kill, take or destroy any female deer, antelope, elk, mountain sheep or doe shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

"(7) Every person who shall at any time hunt, pursue, take, kill or destroy any spotted fawn shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

"(9) Every person who, in the county of Humboldt, shall at any time sell, or offer for sale, the hide or meat of any deer, elk, antelope or mountain sheep shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

"(10) Every person who, in the county of Humboldt, shall buy, sell, or offer for sale, transport or carry or have in his possession any deer, or deer skins, or any hide or pelt from which the evidence of sex has been removed, or any of the aforesaid game at a time when it is unlawful to kill the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The construction given to section 10 by the justice before whom the petitioners were tried and convicted, and now insisted upon by respondent, is that it is unlawful to have in one's possession at any time when it is unlawful to kill deer any deer skin, whether the evidence of sex has been removed or not. The open season being from July 15th to October 15th, it would necessarily follow, if that construction is correct, that the complaint and judgment charging the possession of deer skins on December 20th stated an offense for which the petitioners might be properly convicted and imprisoned. But such construction cannot be maintained. It concedes, as all must concede, that it is lawful to have in one's possession, during the time it is lawful to kill deer, the skins or hides, provided the evidence of sex has not been removed. By section 9 it is unlawful to sell the hide or skin of any deer at any time, whether during the time it is lawful to kill male deer, or during the time it is unlawful to do so. But it is unlawful to kill a female deer at any time, and because of that prohibition, and as an aid to the detection of its violation, it is made unlawful to have in one's possession at any time the skin or hide from which the evidence of sex has been removed. If it were unlawful to have deer skins in one's possession at any time, there could be no reason for the provision that the evidence of sex shall not be removed from the skins. Coming back, then, to the concession that one may lawfully have in possession deer skins during the time male deer may be lawfully killed, if the evidence of sex has not been removed, what is to be done with the skins when that season closes? It is unlawful to sell them "at any time," and if it is unlawful to have them in one's possession after the season closes, what resource is left but to destroy them? And how would the destruction of all the hides on October 16th, each year, tend to the protection of game? It could have no such tendency; but, on the contrary, would tend to defeat the purpose of the ordinance to protect female deer by the requirement that the evidence of sex shall not be removed, since the destruction of the hide would be such removal. It would have been a singular requirement if the ordinance had provided that at the end of the open season all skins of deer should be destroyed; but it would not be more singular than it now is, if the construction contended for by the people can be sustained, which is that if you sell the hides you are guilty of a misdemeanor, and if you keep them after October 15th you are equally guilty. Indeed, the efficiency of the ordinance, so far as it relates to the protection of the female,—and that is its most important provision,—rests in the preservation of the skins, and keeping them in possession without removing the evidence of sex. We see nothing in the ordinance, either in its language or purpose, which would sustain the construction contended for by respondent. No offense known to the law being charged, the petitioners should be discharged.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the said petitioners be, and they are hereby, discharged.

GAROUTTE, J., being absent, did not participate in the foregoing decision.

GRANT et al. v. McPHERSON et al. (No. 18,189.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 22, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to determine water rights in a running stream, where there is uncontradicted evidence tending to show a prior occupancy by the plaintiff, and the evidence as to adverse user by the defendant is conflicting, a judgment for plaintiff will not be disturbed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by William Grant and others against Margaret I. McPherson and others to determine water rights in a running stream. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. W. Street and J. F. Rooney, for appellants. F. D. Nicol and E. A. Rogers, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action brought to determine that plaintiffs are entitled to have 100 inches of water flow to the head of their ditch in Sandy gulch, and to have it determined that they are entitled to divert that quantity of water for the purposes stated in the complaint. Defendants deny that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought, and base their denial upon the ground that defendants are the owners of the first right to the waters of Sandy gulch, and this because their grantors first appropriated the waters and, secondly, that, assuming plaintiffs to have acquired the first right by prior appropriation, still they have lost that right, and the defendants have secured the same by adverse user. A jury was impaneled to advise the court as to the facts, and 133 special issues were submitted to them for their consideration. The court adopted the findings of the jury upon these special issues as its findings of fact, and rendered judgment thereon. Appellants made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and thereupon took the present appeal to this court from the order denying such motion. It is not insisted by appellants that the judgment is not in line with the findings of fact, but it is insisted that the findings have not sufficient support in the evidence, and the important matters raised by this appeal are exclusively questions of fact.

The principal question disclosed by the record is, did plaintiffs or defendants obtain title to the waters of Sandy gulch by actual appropriation? And the determination of that question rests upon the parol evidence of a great number of witnesses as to the acts of the grantors of these respective parties at least 40 years ago, and the conditions surrounding this water way at that time. The parties to this litigation not only rely upon acts of appropriation for their respective titles occurring so many years in the past, but the inception of these titles is laid at about the same time. Under such circumstances most naturally a conflict of testimony arose as to the fact of the first appropriation. A mass of evidence was placed before the court and jury upon this question, and upon such evidence the court and the jury found in favor of plaintiffs; and upon a careful reading of the record we cannot say that there is no substantial and positive conflict upon this disputed question of fact. It would serve no good purpose to take up the testimony of the various witnesses, and analyze it in detail, with the object of indicating specifically this conflict. Appellants base their rights upon actual appropriations made by several different parties, but rely principally upon appropriation by the Bacons. The respondents rest upon an appropriation made by one Morehouse, and, even conceding that the testimony preponderates in favor of appellants' claims, still a first appropriation is shown to have been made by Morehouse by the positive testimony of one John Curtin, whose credibility is not attacked in any way. And this evidence is sufficient to support a finding of fact in this regard. While a plaintiff is required to establish his case by a preponderance of evidence, a preponderance of evidence does not necessarily mean a preponderance of the number of witnesses; and upon a question of the character here presented this court cannot say that the evidence of two witnesses, or of three witnesses, must, as to certain facts, overthrow the evidence of one witness testifying to a contrary state of facts. Appellants concede that the evidence of the witness Curtin supports the finding of the court, but insist that his opportunities for observation at the time were limited, and that at most he was but a passing observer of unimportant events to him, and that his time and attention in those days were directed to more stirring scenes, and his mind resting upon more important things. This may all be true, and these things would seem to be arguments of weight before a jury or a court seeking to arrive at the truth, but we hold them of little moment here. His evidence was sufficient to establish a prima facie case, and, even though the weight of evidence was to the contrary, the finding of fact would not be disturbed. Lick v. Madden, 36 Cal. 213; Kile v. Tubbs, 32 Cal. 332; Jarnatt v. Cooper, 59 Cal. 706; Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 504, 24 Pac. 930. The witness was not impeached in any of the ways provided by statute. Such impeachment was not attempted. Evidently his testimony was believed by the jury and by the court, and under the circumstances here presented we are not at liberty to cast it aside. A wall of adjudications to this effect has been raised up by this court, which we have no desire to pass over or batter down, for the wisdom of the rule declared in those adjudications cannot be gainsaid. There is evidence in the record other than Curtin's testimony tending to support plaintiffs' claims, but it is not necessary to call especial attention to it.

Have appellants acquired title to this water by adverse user? The verdict of the jury and the findings of fact made by the court declare that they failed to secure title in that way, and all that we have heretofore said upon the question of a substantial conflict in the evidence may be considered as again said upon this branch of the case. Experience has demonstrated that the only safe rule, and therefore the only wise rule, to follow where a substantial conflict in the evidence is disclosed by the record, is the one which this court has so long and so steadfastly adhered to. The evidence is clearly conflicting upon the question of adverse user for the statutory period, and we cannot disturb the findings of the court in that regard.

We do not think the other sources of title relied upon by appellants are sufficiently meritorious to defeat respondents' claims. Neither do we discern any errors of law upon the part of the court occurring during the progress of the trial that demand a reversal of the order. For the foregoing reasons the order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

McLAUGHLIN v. McLAUGHLIN et al. (No. 15,249.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 24, 1894.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION—CHANGE OF BENEFICIARY—REQUIREMENTS OF BY-LAWS—WAIVER.

1. Where the by-laws of a mutual benefit association provide that, to change the beneficiary in a policy, the policy shall be surrendered, the beneficiary named in the policy is entitled to the money, though the insured, who married after taking out the policy, intended to make his wife the beneficiary, and a few days before his death handed the policy to his brother, who promised to have the wife made the beneficiary, but failed to do so.

2. A mutual benefit association cannot, after a policy holder's death, waive the requirements of the by-laws as to the mode of changing the beneficiary in the policy.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Hettie McLaughlin against Lottie McLaughlin and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Marcus Rosenthal, for appellants. Jones & O'Donnell, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. In July, 1886, Alexander McLaughlin became a member of Mission Council of the Order of Chosen Friends, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Indiana, and received a relief-fund certificate, stating that he had become a member of the order, "and entitled to all the rights and privileges of membership, and a benefit of not exceeding two thousand dollars from the relief fund of said order, which sum shall in case of death be paid to the nephews and nieces, John, Robert, Jennie, and Lottie McLaughlin, children of Armor McLaughlin, in the manner and subject to the conditions set forth in the laws governing said relief fund and in the application for membership." Afterwards Mission Council was dissolved, and he became a member of Home Council of the same order, and continued to be a member thereof, in good standing, until he died, on March 28, 1890. On February 18, 1890, he and the plaintiff intermarried, and thereafter were husband and wife up to the time of his death. In August 1890, the plaintiff commenced this action against the four beneficiaries named in the relief-fund certificate, their father, Armor McLaughlin, and the Supreme and Home Councils of the Order of Chosen Friends, alleging in her complaint facts which it was claimed entitled her to the $2,000 to be paid on the death of her husband. Before the trial of the action all the parties thereto entered into a written stipulation whereby the said councils disclaimed any and all interest or right in or to the $2,000 in controversy, and whereby it was agreed that the said sum of money should be deposited in a certain savings bank, in the names of the attorneys of the parties, in trust for the person or persons who should be found entitled thereto by the final judgment to be rendered in the action; and, in pursuance of this stipulation, the money was deposited as agreed, and the action was then dismissed as to the defendant councils. After trial the court found the facts to be substantially as alleged in the complaint, and, as conclusions of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to the said money. Judgment was accordingly entered in her favor, from which and from an order denying a new trial the defendants the McLaughlins appeal.

Appellants contend that the decision was not justified by the evidence, and was against law, and also that several errors of law were committed by the court in its rulings upon the admission of evidence.

The constitution and laws of the order contain the following provisions:

"Sec. 111. There shall be connected with this order a relief fund, from which each beneficiary member, the person or persons designated by said member related to or dependent upon him or her, or the legal representatives of such person or persons, shall be entitled, under the prescribed regulations and conditions, to draw a sum not exceeding the amount named in his or her certificate, as hereinafter specified. During his or her life each member shall have full control of his or her interest in this fund," etc.

"Sec. 162. Each member shall enter upon his application the name or names of the person or persons related to him or her to whom he or she desires the benefit to be paid in case of death, subject, however, to such future disposal of the benefit as the member may thereafter direct, not in conflict with section 111, and the same shall be entered in the relief-fund certificate according to such direction."

"Sec. 172. A member in good standing may at any time surrender his or her relief-fund certificate, and a new certificate shall then be issued, payable to such person or persons related to or dependent upon him or her as the member may direct, upon payment of the certificate fee ($1)."

To establish the plaintiff's right to the money as against the beneficiaries named in the certificate, evidence was introduced on her behalf showing the following facts: C. L. Stone was the secretary of Mission Council when Alexander McLaughlin became a member thereof, and continued to be its secretary until it ceased to exist, and as such secretary he issued to McLaughlin his relief-fund certificate. They were intimate friends, and in 1888 both became members of Home Council at the same time. McLaughlin never attended any of the meetings of either council after his initiation. Stone was never secretary of the new council, but he paid all of McLaughlin's dues, and from time to time furnished him with receipts therefor, signed by its secretary, who was a Mrs. Carroll. About a week after plaintiff and McLaughlin were married, he gave her his certificate, and she put it away, and thereafter retained possession of it until after his death. At the time of handing the certificate to her, he told her he was going out that day to see Mr. Stone, and have it changed to her name. He returned in the evening, and told her he had not been able to find Mr. Stone. On March 7th he saw Stone, and told him he desired to have the certificate changed, and made payable to his wife, and thereupon they agreed to meet at the next regular meeting of the Home Council, to be held on March 11th, and have the change made. Stone then told him that it would be necessary to write out an application to the secretary and to surrender the certificate. He told his wife of the appointment made with Stone, and together they went to the meeting agreed upon, but Stone was not there, and nothing was done. Three days later he was taken sick with pneumonia, from which sickness he never recovered. On March 23d plaintiff sent word to Armor McLaughlin, telling him of her husband's condition. Armor called that evening, and, finding his brother very sick, advised him to transfer all his property to his wife. Alexander then asked Armor to have the certificate changed and made payable to his wife, and asked her to get the certificate, which she did. Armor read it over, and then handed it back, saying, "I will attend to it to-morrow." As Armor was leaving the house that evening, he said to one Webster, a brother-in-law of the plaintiff, that he would go the first thing the next morning and have the certificate changed, and that, in case he could not get it changed, or his brother should die, he would draw the money in the children's names, and turn it over to the plaintiff. Armor called again the next day, and in his presence Alexander then transferred to his wife all his property, consisting of a lot in Seattle and $2,500, money on deposit in a bank, and during that day Armor stated to said Webster that he had sent one Hansen with $25 to see the secretary and have it all straightened out; and in the afternoon of the same day Alexander called Webster to his bedside, and asked him if everything had been straightened, and mentioned the certificate, and Webster, relying on what Armor had told him, said it had; and he said it was all right. Plaintiff first learned that she had not been substituted as beneficiary about a month after her husband's death. Meantime plaintiff had frequently asked Armor about the certificate, but he gave no definite answer, and said he did not know anything about the laws of the society, but, any way, she would not hear anything for 60 or 90 days.

It is urged on behalf of respondent that the laws of mutual benefit associations, providing how a change of beneficiaries may be made, are for the protection and benefit of the association alone, and that when in this case the councils entered into the stipulation above referred to, and thereby disclaimed any right to the money in controversy, they in effect waived, as they might do, a compliance with their laws by McLaughlin, and hence that appellants cannot invoke them for their benefit. It is further urged that since McLaughlin expressed a desire to have the certificate changed by substituting respondent as beneficiary therein, and took the steps indicated to accomplish that end, it should be regarded, under the rule that equity will consider that done which ought to be done, as in fact changed, so as to entitle respondent to the money. We do not regard the stipulation as in any way material to a determination of the case. It shows only that the councils made no claim to the money, and were willing to pay it into court, and let it go to the party or parties who might be adjudged entitled to it. It is true that during his life McLaughlin had full control over his interest in the fund, and had a right at any time to have his certificate changed by substituting a new beneficiary; and, while he lived, the beneficiaries named in the certificate had no vested interest in the money to be paid on his death; but, when he died, the right to the money did vest either in the respondent or appellants, and the councils had thereafter no power, by stipulation or otherwise, to change or affect that right. The question, then, is, did the expressed desire of McLaughlin to have the respondent substituted as beneficiary, and the steps taken to that end, have the effect to make the change, when the certificate was not surrendered, but remained all the time in respondent's possession, and no application was made to the secretary or other officer to have it changed? This is the first time that a question of this character has ever been presented to this court for decision, but there have been numerous decisions in other states directly bearing upon it. The general and prevailing rule, as shown by these decisions, is that, when the laws of a benefit society prescribe a mode of changing the beneficiary, the mode prescribed must be followed, and no change can be made in any other manner. See Nibl. Mut. Ben. Soc. § 221 et seq., and cases cited; also, Bac. Ben. Soc. § 307, and cases cited. In Wendt v. Legion of Honor, 72 Iowa, 682, 34 N. W. 470, it was held that, as the provisions of the constitution pertaining to the subject were a part of the contract of insurance, the insured could not make any change of beneficiaries, except by compliance therewith, and also that expressed intentions and oral declarations can have no effect to change beneficiaries; and in that case, as in this, it was claimed that, as the order was willing to pay the money into court to be disposed of as should be directed by the final judgment, it had waived a compliance with its laws. The court said: "But it is said this is a matter to which the defendant can only object. We think differently. While the heirs, during the life of the assured, had no right in the policy, their interest being nothing more than in expectancy, upon his death they acquired rights which cannot be cut off except in the manner prescribed by the contract. If that was not done, the defendant could not, even by positive consent after their rights had attached, by act or word do anything to defeat these rights. It is controlled by the contract as it was at the death of the assured." In Supreme Conclave v. Cappella, 41 Fed. 1, the general rule is declared as follows: "In making such change of beneficiary, however, the insured is bound to do it in the manner pointed out by the policy and the by-laws of the association, and any material deviation from this course will invalidate the transfer." It is said in that case, however, that the general rule is subject to three exceptions: (1) If the society has waived a strict compliance with its own rules, and, in pursuance of a request of the insured to change his beneficiary, has issued a new certificate, the original beneficiary will not be heard to complain that the course indicated by the regulations was not pursued. (2) If it be beyond the power of the insured to comply literally with the regulations, a court of equity will treat the change as having been legally made. (3) If the insured has pursued the course pointed out by the laws of the association, and has done all in his power to change the beneficiary, but, before the new certificate is actually issued, he dies, a court of equity will treat such certificate as having been issued. The same exceptions are recognized in some of the other cases, but it is evident that this case does not come within either of them. Here the council did not waive a compliance with its laws, and issue a new certificate, and it was not beyond the power of the insured to comply literally therewith. Nor did the insured pursue the course pointed out by the laws, and do all in his power to have the change made. He might have had the certificate surrendered as required, but this was never done or attempted to be done, and no application to the secretary for a change was made. We conclude, therefore, that the case falls within the general rule, and that the beneficiaries named in the certificate were entitled to the money, and the court below should have so determined. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of the appellants.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of the appellants.

LANGE v. BRAYNARD et al. (No. 18,252.)

NEW PARTIES—HOW AFFECTED BY PREVIOUS PROCEEDINGS — RIGHT TO CROSS-EXAMINE WITNESSES.

Where, in an action to subject land to a judgment, a person to whom the land was conveyed before the commencement of the action is, by order of the trial court, made a party thereto, he may demand that a deposition already taken be stricken out, and that he be allowed to cross-examine the witnesses who have already testified.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

Action by H. D. Lange against C. P. Braynard and others to subject land to the payment of a judgment. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Chas. G. Nagle, Nagle & Nagle, P. B. Nagle, and W. Henry Jones, for appellants. A. M. McCoy and H. P. Andrews, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This action was originally commenced by the plaintiff against the defendants C. P. Braynard, William Nagle, and P. M. Cleghorn, for the purpose of subjecting the land described in the complaint to the payment of a judgment theretofore recovered by plaintiff against defendant Braynard, the complaint alleging that said land had been conveyed by said Braynard to the defendant William Nagle, and by said Nagle to the defendant Cleghorn, and that said conveyances were both made without consideration, and for the purpose of delaying and defrauding the plaintiff and other creditors of the defendant Braynard. The defendants William Nagle and Cleghorn filed an answer, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and thereafter, on May 4, 1891, and before the commencement of the trial of the action, the deposition of defendant Braynard was taken by the plaintiff, the defendants Cleghorn and William Nagle being represented at the taking of such deposition by their attorney in the action, P. B. Nagle. The action was commenced in April, 1891, and it appears that prior thereto the defendant Cleghorn conveyed the land in controversy to the said P. B. Nagle, but said deed was not recorded until August 17, 1891. Upon the trial, which was commenced in December, 1891, after the said deposition of Braynard had been read in evidence, and the testimony of other witnesses given, and the plaintiff had rested his case, and some testimony had been offered in behalf of defendants, the court made an order directing that the said P. B. Nagle be made a party defendant, which was accordingly done. It is shown by the bill of exceptions that upon the making of this order the said P. B. Nagle "then and there objected to being made a party defendant, and objected to said order, unless he had the privilege of examining the witnesses introduced on behalf of the plaintiff and those already introduced upon behalf of the other defendants, and of cross-examining said witnesses, and each and every one of them; and objected and requested and moved the court that, so far as he was concerned, and against him, that the evidence of said plaintiff and his witnesses be not considered against him without his right to cross-examine the same, and moved the same be stricken out as to him; and on the further ground he objected to all the evidence and depositions heretofore introduced as against him, on the ground that the privilege of cross-examining and objecting to their evidence had not been accorded him, and as against him the same is and was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent." These objections and motions were denied, and in so doing the court stated "that the same objection and rulings and exceptions on the part of the other defendants may be considered as taken by P. B. Nagle." The plaintiff recovered a judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, from which, and the order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

The defendants contend that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings, and complain of many of the rulings made during the course of the trial, but we only deem it necessary to notice the question presented by the ruling of the court in refusing to strike out the deposition of Braynard, and in refusing to allow the further cross-examination of the other witnesses whose testimony was given before the defendant P. B. Nagle was made a party to the action. This ruling was erroneous, and, as the evidence to which it related is material, the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed. Although the defendant P. B. Nagle derived his title to the land in controversy from the other defendants, yet, such title having been acquired prior to the commencement of the action, he would not have been affected by the judgment therein without being made a party thereto. Brady v. Burke, 90 Cal. 6, 27 Pac. 52; Campbell v. Hall, 16 N. Y. 575. "To make one a privy to an action he must be one who has acquired an interest in the subject-matter of the action either by inheritance, succession, or purchase from a party to the action subsequent to its institution. A privity antedating the action does not work an estoppel. Verdicts, judgments, depositions in a former cause, and the former testimony of deceased witnesses, are considered as resting on the same principle." Bryan v. Malloy, 90 N. C. 508. In the case of a party brought in by way of substitution,—as, for instance, the executor of a deceased party, or the purchaser of the interest of a party with notice of the pendency of an action against his grantor,—such substituted party takes the case as he finds it, and is bound by the prior proceedings to the same extent as was his predecessor, and this is so because such substituted party is in privity with his predecessor. Thus, the rule is stated in 2 Barb. Ch. Pr. p. 79: "It is also laid down that in cases of alienation pendente lite the alienee is bound by the proceedings in the suit after alienation and before the alienee became a party to it; and depositions of a witness, taken after the alienation, and before the alienee became a party, may be used by the other parties against the alienee as they might have been used against the party under whom he claims." But here the title of defendant P. B. Nagle was not acquired pendente lite, but before the commencement of the action, and when he became a party the action was, as to him, a new action (Borst v. Boyd, 3 Sandf. Ch. 501), and he could not be compelled to accept depositions taken or testimony given in the case before he was made a party. In the case of Jenkins v. Bisbee, 1 Edw. Ch. 377, it was held that a person made a party to a suit after testimony taken cannot be affected by such proof; and to the same effect are the cases of Hutchinson v. Reed, Hoff. Ch. 316, and Pratt v. Barker, 1 Sim. 1. In Wood v. Swift, 81 N. Y. 31, the case had been referred to a referee, and witnesses examined, when the complaint was amended by adding new parties defendant; and, upon such amendment being made, the trial court entered an order to the effect that the case should "remain, continue, and be tried before the referee * * * as though all parties now to the record had thus been from the beginning of the action," "the added defendants, however, to have the privilege of cross-examining the witnesses theretofore examined." This order was reversed by the court of appeals, the court saying: "It is conceded by appellants' counsel that the court had the power, under section 452 of the Code, to bring in the appellant and the other persons as parties defendant to the action; but, even if it could do that, it could not compel them to accept the referee who had been appointed, and to accept the evidence which had been taken, even with the right of cross-examination which was secured to them. * * * The appellant had the right to have the cause tried by the court without a jury, and he at least had the right to be heard as to the appointment of a referee, and he had the right to be present when the witnesses were sworn and examined." The principle thus declared is controlling here. A party can no more be compelled to accept a deposition taken in an action to which he was neither party nor privy, than to accept a referee under the circumstances appearing in the case just cited. Nor is the case at all changed by the fact that the deed to Nagle was not recorded at the time of the commencement of the action, or when the deposition of Braynard was taken; nor by the further fact that Nagle was the attorney for the other defendants when such deposition was given, and when the evidence of the other witnesses was admitted, and that as such attorney he cross-examined such witnesses for his clients. Conceding all these matters, the fact still remains that the deposition was taken in an action to which P. B. Nagle was not a party, and therefore was not admissible against him, and the court ought to have given him the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses previously testifying at the trial, if he desired so to do. Judgment and order reversed.

WALSER v. AUSTIN. (No. 18,249.)

SPECIAL LAWS—APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS.

Act March 31, 1891, § 170, subd. 21 (County Government Act), which provides that in counties of the eighth class only district attorneys may appoint assistants, violates Const. art. 11, § 5, which directs that the legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment of county officers, and prescribe their duties. Welsh v. Bramlet, 33 Pac. 66, 98 Cal. 219, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Mark Walser against R. H. Austin. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Merriam, for appellant. Sayle & Caldwell, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. It was held in the case of Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 33 Pac. 66, that subdivision 21 of section 170 of the county government act, approved March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 295),[1] contains local and special legislation, and is in conflict with section 5 of article 11 of the constitution of the state, which directs that the legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment in the several counties of such county, township, and municipal officers "as public convenience may require, and shall prescribe their duties and fix their terms of office." We can add nothing to the reasoning by which that conclusion was reached, and upon the authority of that case the judgment and order herein must be affirmed. Judgment and order affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment solely upon the authority of Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 33 Pac. 66, and Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, and 29 Pac. 1092, in which cases I could not concur.

SORENSEN v. DORRIS. (No. 18,339.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 24, 1894.)

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL.

An appeal will be dismissed where appellant fails to file his printed points and authorities within the time prescribed by a rule of court.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county.

Action between one Sorensen and one Dorris. From the judgment, Dorris appealed, and Sorensen moves to dismiss the appeal. Dismissed.

R. M. J. Soto, for appellant. L. F. Coburn and J. N. Parker, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The appellant herein having failed to file with the clerk of this court his printed points and authorities on appeal within the time prescribed by subdivision 4 of rule 2 of this court, respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment and order must be granted. Appeals from judgment and order dismissed.

KINGS COUNTY v. JOHNSON. (No. 18,285.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1894.)

MANDAMUS—JURISDICTION—TAXES COLLECTED BY WRONG COUNTY—PAYMENT TO PROPER COUNTY—ENFORCEMENT—CREATION OF NEW COUNTY.

1. Mandamus will not lie to compel the tax collector of one county to pay over to the collector of another county taxes belonging to the latter county which he has unlawfully collected, as mandamus cannot serve the purpose of an action for money had and received.

2. Act March 22, 1893, providing for the formation of K. county, provides that the tax collector of T. county shall, on demand, furnish and assign to the collector of K. county a list of all the unpaid taxes levied on property within K. county. Held, that mandamus will lie to compel the collector to furnish such list.

3. Act March 22, 1893, entitled an act to "create the county of Kings," etc., which provides for the manner in which the unpaid taxes which have already been levied on property within its boundaries shall be collected by the county, is not unconstitutional as embracing matter not indicated by its title.

4. The provision for the collection of the taxes levied being a part of the creation of the county, the act is not special legislation, except so far as the creation of a new county is such.

5. Const. art. 6, § 5, provides that process of the courts shall extend to all parts of the state, and that "said courts and judges shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, * * * and habeas corpus, on petition by or on behalf of any person in actual custody in their respective counties." Held, the phrase "in their respective counties" limits the power of the court merely in regard to the writ of habeas corpus, and therefore mandamus may extend beyond the county.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kings county; Justin Jacobs, Judge.

Petition by Kings county for a writ of mandamus against J. Sub. Johnson. From a judgment granting the writ, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. M. L. Short, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from a judgment awarding a peremptory writ of mandate, entered upon an order overruling a demurrer to the petition; the defendant declining to answer. The petition shows that defendant was and is tax collector of Tulare county, the affiant being tax collector of Kings county. That Kings county was created March 22, 1893. That the fifteenth section of the act creating the county reads as follows: "Sec. 15. It shall be the duty of the tax collector of the county of Tulare upon the demand of the tax-collector of the county of Kings to furnish, assign and transfer to the tax-collector of the county of Kings a complete list of all unpaid taxes assessed and levied during the year eighteen hundred and ninety-two, on property within the boundaries of the county of Kings. The tax-collector of the county of Tulare shall file a duplicate list of such unpaid taxes assessed within the boundaries of the county of Kings with the county auditor of Tulare county. The tax-collector of the county of Kings shall give to the tax-collector of the county of Tulare a receipt for said list of said unpaid taxes, and shall file a duplicate list with the auditor of the county of Kings, and thereupon all such unpaid taxes shall become payable to the tax-collector of the county of Kings, and he is hereby authorized to collect and receipt for the same." June 29, 1893, affiant, as tax collector of Kings county, demanded from defendant that as tax collector of Tulare he furnish, assign, and transfer to said affiant a complete list of the unpaid taxes assessed and levied during the year 1892 on property within the boundaries of the county of Kings. That defendant utterly refused so to do, but, on the contrary, proceeded to collect such unpaid taxes to the amount of $1,300, which he now holds in his possession, and refuses to deliver to the tax collector of the county of Kings. Wherefore petitioner demands a writ of mandate commanding said defendant to furnish such list. An alternate writ was issued, commanding defendant, as tax collector of Tulare county, to furnish such list, and to deliver to affiant, tax collector of Kings county, all taxes collected by said tax collector within the boundaries of Kings county since the formation of such county, or show cause, etc. On the return day defendant demurred to the petition on two grounds: (1) It appeared that the court had no jurisdiction to issue the writ; (2) insufficiency of facts. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant declined to answer. Thereupon judgment was entered awarding a peremptory mandate in the terms of the alternate writ.

I know of no warrant for that portion of the mandate which commands defendant to pay to the tax collector of Kings county moneys which defendant has collected from the taxpayers of Kings county. The act of the legislature contains no authority on the part of the tax collector of Kings county to demand or receive such money. It does not authorize the tax collector of the county of Tulare to collect any taxes for the county of Kings. In fact, by implication it prohibits any collections on his part in the county of Kings after the demand provided for has been made by the tax collector of Kings county. Nor do I see any right which the county of Kings can assert to taxes collected by the tax collector of Tulare prior to the demand. The lien of the taxes for the year 1892 had already attached, and, unless the legislature saw fit to provide otherwise, such taxes due upon property situated in that portion of the former county of Tulare which was set off to the new county was collectible by the tax collector of Tulare. The only provision made in regard to the matter is that upon demand the unpaid taxes in that portion set off to the new county shall be transferred to the new county, and may be collected by the tax collector of Kings. There is no language which would seem to imply that any taxes collected prior to the demand, and since the creation of the new county, shall belong to the new county. On the contrary, the law requires the tax collector of Tulare to pay over each month all taxes collected by him, and I do not see what defense defendant could make to an action on the part of Tulare to compel him to pay into the treasury all taxes collected prior to such demand. But mandamus cannot serve the purpose of an action for money had and received. It can only compel the performance of a duty enjoined by law. The act imposes no duty upon the tax collector of Tulare to the county of Kings, or in which that county is interested, except his duty to furnish the list of unpaid taxes. He has, by his wrongful act, come into the possession of money which belongs to Kings county. At least either such is the case, or his collection is void, and the taxpayers still owe the tax. He can probably be made to pay it to the county of Kings. But it is not due to the tax collector of the county of Kings, nor can the payment be compelled by mandamus. But I think the tax collector of Tulare may be compelled by mandamus to furnish the list provided for. Here the act imposes a plain duty, in regard to which the officer had no discretion.

It is contended, however, that section 15 is unconstitutional, because the subject-matter of the section is not expressed in the title of the act, and because it is special legislation. I do not think either objection can be sustained. It is admitted that the legislature has the power to provide for the organization of new counties; that this act, so far as it creates the new county, is valid. Of course, to do this it must—or at least may—provide in detail for its organization and its working machinery. As its territory must be taken from other counties, such law could naturally provide for a division of the public property, if it must be divided, and for the payment of indebtedness. It would evidently be proper for such law to provide for the collection of the taxes which would become due on property in the new county. The lien of the taxes might attach, as here, before the new county would be organized, but the tax, in whole or in part, be collected afterwards. I see no constitutional objection to a provision in regard to the collection of these taxes, and as to whom they shall belong. It would seem eminently proper that such provision should be made. If entitled to criticise the act under consideration in this respect, I should say it is defective in that it is not sufficiently specific, and does not go far enough. Now, all these matters, and many others which would naturally be regulated in such an act, are included in the subject expressed in the title of the act. Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 636, 29 Pac. 251. The title of the act is, "An act to create the county of Kings, to define the boundaries thereof, and to provide for its organization and election of officers, and to classify said county." All the matters stated in the title constitute but one subject, to wit, the creation of the county of Kings; and section 15 is a natural and logical part of that subject. This being so, it is not special legislation, except as the creation of a new county is special legislation.

I have so far not noticed the proposition that the court had no jurisdiction to issue the writ. It is argued that the writ cannot be issued to run out of the county, or to be executed out of the county. The claim is founded upon a construction of section 5, art. 6, of the state constitution. That portion of the section which is material here reads as follows: "They shall be always open (legal holidays and non-judicial days excepted), and their process shall extend to all parts of the state; provided, that all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof affected by such action or actions, is situated.

Said courts and their judges shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, quo warranto and habeas corpus, on petition by or on behalf of any person in actual custody in their respective counties. Injunction and writs of prohibition may be issued and served on legal holidays and nonjudicial days." It is said that there should be a comma after the word "custody," and that the phrase "in their respective counties" limits the power of the court as to all the writs mentioned. It is somewhat strange if the convention provided first that the process of these courts shall extend throughout the state, and immediately add that certain important processes shall be issued only in their respective counties, meaning thereby that they shall not extend throughout the state. And how inapt the language to accomplish the supposed purpose. Why should the constitution prohibit the courts from issuing their writs anywhere else than in their respective counties? All writs, whether extending throughout the state or not, would be issued there. The phrase is exactly adapted to express a limitation to the jurisdiction of the court in matters of habeas corpus to the county in which a person is held in actual custody, and we find precisely the same phrase was used twice in the former constitution for the same purpose. And, if the section is to be construed as is contended by appellant, it will apply quite differently to matters of habeas corpus from what has always been understood and practiced. One might be in San Francisco, and yet hold a child in custody in Kings county. Which court would have jurisdiction,—San Francisco or Kings? As the law has always been understood, the court in the county of Kings would have jurisdiction and could extend its writ to San Francisco or elsewhere to reach the responsible party. I think the order or judgment should be modified so as to confine its operation to the duty prescribed in the statute, to wit, to require the appellant to furnish, assign, and transfer the tax list described in the complaint, and that, as modified, it should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order or judgment is modified so as to confine its operation to the duty prescribed in the statute, to wit, to require the appellant to furnish, assign, and transfer the tax list described in the complaint, and that, as modified, it is affirmed.

KELLY v. BRADBURY. (No. 15,554.)

REVERSAL ON APPEAL.

Where, on appeal on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, the respondent not only fails to file a brief, but also to argue the case orally, the judgment will be reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Thomas Kelly against William B. Bradbury. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gordon & Young, for appellant. Chas. A. Low, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It appears from the record that the verdict of the jury is assailed by the specifications on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support it. There is no brief on file by respondent, nor was the case orally argued in his behalf. It therefore follows, on the authority of Richter v. Irrigation Co. (Cal.) 36 Pac. 96, and Davis v. Hart (Cal.) 37 Pac. 486, that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed. So ordered.

4 Cal. Unrep. 805

TODD v. MARTIN. (No. 18,307.)

ACTION AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR — SERVICES AS NURSE—EVIDENCE — DEFENDANT'S COMPETENCY AS WITNESS.

1. A verdict rendered on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

2. Evidence showing that services were rendered by one as nurse to deceased is sufficient to charge the estate therefor, without proof of an express request by deceased.

3. Where plaintiff, after the death of deceased, continued in his former work of taking care of the latter's stables and stock without any authority from the administratrix, such services form a charge of necessity on the estate.

4. Expenses incurred by the widow before she was appointed administratrix, and not apparently for the benefit of the estate, are not chargeable against it.

5. Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, disqualifies parties or assignors of parties to an action against an executor or administrator, or persons in whose behalf such action is prosecuted on a claim against the estate of the deceased, from testifying as to facts occurring before the death of the deceased. Held, that the disqualification applies only to those parties who assert claims against the estate.

6. Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, provides that the party producing a witness shall not impeach his credit by evidence of bad character, but may contradict him by other evidence, and show former inconsistent statements. Held, that the plaintiff in an action against an administratrix, having called her to testify in his behalf, is not necessarily bound by her answer.

7. In an action against an administratrix for services as nurse to deceased, one who served in the same capacity alternately with plaintiff may testify as to the nature and amount of the services.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Trinity county; T. E. Jones, Judge.

Action by E. N. Todd against Isabell J. Martin, administratrix of the estate of John Martin, deceased, to recover for services as nurse to the deceased in his last illness, and for other services. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter H. Linforth, for appellant. James W. Bartlett, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The defendant appeals from the judgment entered against her upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions setting out the evidence. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled. No point is made thereon in appellant's brief, and, as the complaint states a cause of action, the other objections raised need not be noticed. The claim consisted of several items, aggregating $876.66, and stated several credits, leaving an alleged balance due plaintiff of $368.16, and was allowed by the administratrix, upon presentation, for the sum of $57.08. The jury returned a verdict for $361.16, upon which judgment was entered for plaintiff. Appellant reserved a large number of exceptions to evidence, and also specifies particulars wherein the verdict is not justified by the evidence. The sufficiency of the evidence will be first considered.

1. The first item in plaintiff's claim is for the sum of $93, alleged to have been given by the plaintiff to John Martin in May, 1891, to be placed in his safe for safe-keeping. There was evidence from which the jury would be justified in finding the delivery of the money to Martin, and that it was put in the safe. There was also evidence tending to prove that on February 5, 1892, the money had not been returned to plaintiff. When delivered to Martin, the money was in a purse, according to the testimony of Mr. Everhart, and was counted by Martin; and that on February 5, 1892, he, Everhart, heard Mr. Martin say to plaintiff that he was going below, to be gone some time, and asked Todd whether he wanted his purse, to which Todd replied that he did not. Mr. Martin died July 30, 1892. On August 17th, Mr. Spratt, the public administrator, took charge of the estate, and opened the safe, but did not find any purse containing money; that he found an empty leather bag, which was neither marked nor tagged. John Hewston, who had been in Martin's employ for about 15 years, testified that he knew of Martin's custom with reference to keeping money and packages in his safe for others; that he had frequently kept money for him; but that it was his invariable custom to tag or label all money, packages, or purses belonging to others with their names upon them. A period of nearly seven months elapsed after the conversation in relation to the purse, testified to by Everhart, before the death of Martin, during which the plaintiff had almost daily opportunities of receiving back his purse. On the other hand, plaintiff, during all the time after the deposit, was in the employ of Martin at a salary of $50 per month, and it does not appear that at any time he was in need of money beyond that which he received for his labor. Whatever may be our opinion as to the weight of evidence, we think the evidence was such as to require its submission to the jury, and that this court should not disturb the verdict thereon.

2. As to the amount of credits defendant was entitled to on plaintiff's account for services, the testimony was conflicting to such an extent that we are not permitted to say that upon that point the verdict is not justified by the evidence.

3. It is contended that there is no evidence tending to establish the fact that plaintiff rendered "fifteen days' service, or any number of days' services, to John Martin, as a nurse, at his request." Inasmuch as defendant admitted that plaintiff did serve as a nurse for John Martin for five days during his last illness, we infer that counsel for appellant bases the alleged insufficiency of the evidence upon the absence of direct evidence of a request by John Martin. We think the evidence was sufficient in both particulars. It is not necessary that there should be direct evidence of an express request. The fact that he was called from his regular employment at the livery stable, and devoted his time to the care of Mr. Martin, with his knowledge and that of his wife and the attending physician, is sufficient to show a request. Or, if Mr. Martin had been unconscious, the request of the wife or the physician would have been deemed his request.

4. One item in plaintiff's claim is for seventeen days' services at the stable, from August 1st to the 17th, which was after the death of Mr. Martin. It is objected that these services were not shown to have been rendered "at the request of Mrs. Martin, as administratrix of the deceased." The facts were that, prior to his death, the deceased conducted a livery stable, and plaintiff was employed therein for a year or more at a compensation of $50 per month. From the time of Martin's death until August 17th, there was no administrator or other person legally authorized to take charge of the estate, or to employ any one in any service connected therewith. It could not have been the duty of the plaintiff, in view of his past employment by Mr. Martin in that service, to have ceased to care for the property, or permit the horses to die of hunger or thirst. Services of this character so rendered prior to the appointment of an administrator must be deemed to have been included in the term of service contracted for by the deceased, and to form a proper charge against the estate; or, if it cannot be placed upon that ground, it is, while not a debt either of the intestate or the administrator, a charge thrown upon the assets by necessity, but for which the administratrix subsequently appointed would not be personally liable. It is analogous to a claim for funeral expenses paid by a person other than the administrator or executor, which, at common law, are a charge against the estate, though not strictly a debt due from the decedent. In Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, the defendant in an action upon an obligation made to the deceased, but payable to the executor, was permitted to set off the funeral expenses of the deceased paid by the defendant. In Hapgood v. Houghton, 10 Pick. 154, it was held that the law raises a promise on the part of the executor or administrator to pay for the funeral expenses as far as he has assets, and that if he have no assets he should plead that fact in bar, and that if he has, the judgment must be against them in his hands. Humanity, as well as the interests of the estate, required that the stock be cared for, and no one could more appropriately assume that duty than one who had been employed by the decedent in his lifetime to perform the same service; and as to the value of the services, that compensation which had been paid plaintiff by the decedent will be deemed reasonable; and as to services rendered after the death of Mr. Martin, plaintiff is a competent witness.

The item in plaintiff's claim for the sum of $5 of plaintiff's money, expended in making a trip to Redding and return at the request of Mrs. Martin, August 6, 1892, for the purpose of bringing Henry Martin to Weaverville, is not a charge for which the estate is liable. Mrs. Martin was not then administratrix, nor does the service appear to have been for the benefit of the estate, and no evidence should have been received in regard thereto. It is clear, however, that this item was disallowed by the jury. This item was for $5. There was another item of $2 for "cash paid Lewis Moore, in change." The least of the remaining four items was $28.33. No evidence was given as to the $2 item. The verdict was for $361.16, while the amount claimed was $368.16, the difference being the amount of this and the $2 item above named. The error did not, therefore, prejudice the defendant.

Plaintiff called the defendant as a witness, and asked her to give the dates and items of the cash payments made to the plaintiff between the 1st day of June, 1891, and the 15th of August, 1892. Counsel for defendant objected, on the ground of incompetency, under subdivision 3 of section 1880, Code Civ. Proc., and the objection was overruled. Defendant thereupon, as such witness for the plaintiff, was permitted, over the objection of defendant, to testify from the books of the deceased to the several items of payments referred to in the question. Section 1880, Code Civ. Proc. provides: "The following persons cannot be witnesses: 3. Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim, or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person." This section has been several times considered by the court, but never under precisely the circumstances here existing. We think, however, that in Chase v. Evoy, 51 Cal. 618, a construction was given which may fairly be held to include this case. There the action was against the administratrix upon a claim against the estate, the claim consisting of a promissory note made by the decedent and two others, who were also defendants. The administratrix of the deceased maker called one of her codefendants, and proposed to prove by him "what, if anything, had been paid thereon, and how paid." This court, after saying that the language of the statute, if literally construed, might exclude all parties to the action, whether called to testify for or against the estate, but that to give it such construction would defeat the manifest purpose of the act, and that the language was capable of a different construction, further said: "Parties to the action, or in whose behalf it is prosecuted, are not allowed to testify against the estate in a suit to establish a demand against it. One of the parties to the transaction out of which the demand originated being no longer in esse, it was deemed unwise to permit the other party to testify to his version of the demand when called by the plaintiff in a proceeding to establish the demand. The statute, it is true, provides in general terms that 'the parties to an action or proceeding' against the estate shall not testify, but the obvious meaning of this provision is that a party to the action shall not testify against the executor or administrator." We think it could not have been the intention of the legislature to render incompetent as a witness in such cases the executor or administrator who is charged with the duty of protecting the estate against improper or unjust demands, as in many cases it would tie his hands, and operate to prevent his giving efficient protection, and compel him to stand by with lips sealed, and see the estate despoiled, when, if permitted to speak, the fraudulent or unjust character of the claim would be exposed and defeated. Nor do we think the language of the Code inconsistent with such construction, but, on the contrary, that its manifest intent and purpose require it. We think it is only parties who assert claims against an estate who are rendered incompetent to testify, and that the word "parties" does not refer to the executor or administrator who is the party defendant. If, however, the executor or administrator is the assignor of the claim asserted by the plaintiff, or is a person for whose benefit it is prosecuted, or himself asserts a claim, as he may do, the other language of the section is sufficient either to fix him as the party prosecuting the claim, or as the person for whose benefit it is prosecuted, and upon that ground declare him incompetent, but does not do so simply because he is the party defendant. In Blood v. Fairbanks, 50 Cal. 420, it is true, it was said that all parties to the action were incompetent. But in that case it was not necessary to decide that question. Hewitt had assigned to Blood his interest in the contract, but for some reason he was made a party to the action, though, as he had no interest, he was merely a nominal party. He was held to be incompetent as a witness, because he was a party. But he would have been incompetent if he had not been a party, for the reason that he was an assignor of the plaintiff, and so within the express letter of the statute. In the case at bar we see no reason why the defendant was not a competent witness, and, being competent, because not within any of the grounds mentioned in the Code rendering her incompetent, the plaintiff had the right to call her as his witness.

Plaintiff was asked whether he had a conversation with Mrs. Martin, after the death of Mr. Martin, relative to the purse alleged to have been placed in the safe. The objection made by defendant was properly overruled. The question did not call for the conversation, and the conversation itself might have been of a character to make it relevant and competent. The conversation, as afterwards given by the witness, was unimportant; but, if it was not competent, there was no motion to strike it out.

The testimony of J. C. Todd is relevant so far as it shows the opportunity his employment as nurse gave him of knowing of the services of the plaintiff in the same capacity, and the character of the services required as a nurse in that case. The fact that plaintiff came in the evening, and assumed the duties of nurse, and that the witness found him there in the morning when he returned, was evidence from which the jury could properly infer, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that plaintiff was on duty all night; and defendant's motion to strike out the testimony of the witness was properly denied.

As to appellant's contention that respondent, having called Mrs. Martin as a witness, is bound by her answers, it is sufficient to say that section 2049, Code Civ. Proc.,[1] lays down a different rule. The instruction given to the jury upon this point at defendant's request was not accurate, but was evidently not understood, either by the court or jury, to mean what counsel now contends it means. The court certainly did not understand by the words, "the plaintiff is bound by the testimony of the defendant given by her while a witness on his own behalf," more than is expressed in the section of the Code above cited. Besides, this instruction must be taken in connection with others requested by the defendant, to the effect that the jury were the exclusive judges of the evidence, and that they might "reject the most positive testimony of a witness."

The modifications of defendant's requests to instruct the jury were proper, and the instructions refused were properly refused. These modifications and refusals, so far as they represent any question of importance, fall within points already discussed, and need not be further noticed.

Finding no error which requires a reversal, we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

ALLISON RANCH MIN. CO. v. NEVADA COUNTY. (No. 18,310.)

TAXATION — BOARD OF EQUALIZATION — INCREASE OF ASSESSMENT—NOTICE TO CORPORATE OFFICER.

1. A notice by a county board of equalization, addressed to "D., Owner" of a mine, is not evidence that the property was assessed to D.

2. Where a notice by a county board of equalization was to "D., Owner" of a mine, it may be shown that he was an officer of a corporation owning the mine, authorized to accept service of the notice.

3. A notice by a county board of equalization will not be rendered ineffectual by reason of any inaccuracy on the part of the clerk in making up the minutes of the proceedings of the board.

4. It is not necessary, to authorize a county board of equalization to increase an assessment, that a complaint or affidavit that the assessment is too low should be filed with the board.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Certiorari by the Allison Ranch Mining Company to review the proceedings of the board of equalization of Nevada county. Judgment was rendered for respondent, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Kitts, for appellant. Thos. S. Ford, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This proceeding was commenced in the superior court of Nevada county for the purpose of obtaining a judgment annulling an order of the board of equalization of the county of Nevada, increasing the assessed valuation of certain property belonging to the petitioner. The petitioner is a corporation, and alleges in its petition that the said board of equalization, "without any notice to petitioner, and without taking any evidence or proofs whatever, arbitrarily raised and increased the assessment upon its said property, as made by the assessor, from $12,000 to $25,000." Upon the filing of the petition a writ of certiorari was issued and directed to the county of Nevada. In its return to the writ the county filed an answer denying the allegations of the petition, and also caused to be returned to the court a certified copy of all the proceedings of the county board of equalization, so far as related to the matter of increasing the petitioner's assessment. Upon the hearing the superior court gave judgment to the effect that the petitioner take nothing by the action, and that the petition be dismissed. The judgment itself recites that "upon the evidence, arguments, proofs, and premises, the court finds as true each and every allegation of the answer, and finds as untrue such allegations of the petition as are denied." From this judgment the petitioner appeals, and the case is presented here upon the petition, answer, return, and judgment of the court, and without any bill of exceptions.

[1] Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, provides that "the party producing a witness is not allowed to impeach his credit by evidence of bad character, but he may contradict him by other evidence, and may show that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony."

It is claimed by the petitioner that the following entries appearing in the minutes of the board of equalization show affirmatively that the order complained of was made without notice to the petitioner:

"July 11, 1893. A. E. Davis, owner of the Allison Ranch mine, in Grass Valley township, is hereby cited to appear and show cause why the assessment on said mine should not be raised from $12,000 to $25,000.

"July 17, 1893. A. E. Davis, owner of the Allison Ranch mine, heretofore cited to appear and show cause why the assessment on the Allison Ranch mine should not be raised from $12,000 to $25,000, appeared before the board through C. W. Kitts, Esq., who being duly sworn, made a statement in relation to the said mine. The board took the matter under advisement. Ordered, that the assessment of the Allison Ranch Mining Company, on the Allison Ranch mine, in Grass Valley township, be raised from $12,000 to $25,000."

It is argued in behalf of the petitioner that this record of the board of equalization shows that its order was based upon notice given to A. E. Davis, and not to the petitioner, and presumptively that the property was originally assessed to Davis as owner. We cannot accept this view. The mere recitals in the minutes of the board referring to A. E. Davis as owner of the Allison Ranch mine do not determine the title to the property. They do not show that the original assessment was not made to the conceded owner, the petitioner here, nor are these entries at all inconsistent with the fact that A. E. Davis was the president, secretary, or managing agent of the petitioner; and, if he was, the notice served upon him of the intention of the board to increase the assessment of the Allison Ranch mine was notice to the petitioner, and such notice was not rendered ineffectual by any want of accuracy upon the part of the clerk in making up the minute entries in relation to it. It was competent upon the hearing before the superior court to show by evidence aliunde the minutes that A. E. Davis was the president, secretary, or managing agent of the petitioner, and that the Allison Ranch mine was originally assessed to it; and we will presume, in support of the judgment of the superior court, that such proof was made. Such evidence would not contradict the record of the board of equalization, and would show that it acted within its jurisdiction in making the order complained of. We do not think that the board of equalization should be held to any very strict rules in the matter of keeping the minutes of its proceedings, and the rule as to the matter of notice to be given the property owner in such cases as this is properly stated in Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 103, as follows: "In our opinion, as intimated in Patten v. Green, 13 Cal. 330, such tribunals as the boards of supervisors ought not to be held to any great strictness of procedure in the matters above discussed herein; and if, under a rule or an order of such boards, a party has notice of the intended action of a board of supervisors, sitting as a board of equalization, in regard to the assessment of his property, in time to have a full and fair hearing during the sessions of the board, we will hold such notice to be sufficient, unless it appears affirmatively that a full and fair hearing was denied him by the action of the board."

It is urged that the order of the board was void because not based upon a complaint or affidavit filed with the board. There are two answers to this contention: First, the petition does not assail the jurisdiction of the board upon such ground, and there is nothing in this record to show that the objection was raised in the superior court. Second, under section 3673 of the Political Code, the jurisdiction of the county board of equalization to give notice of its intention to raise any individual assessment is not made to depend upon having before it a complaint or affidavit that such assessment is too low, and asking that the same be increased. The jurisdiction of the board to act in the matter of increasing an assessment is complete after giving to the person assessed the notice prescribed by that section, and the board may give such notice on its own motion. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

DAW v. NILES et al. (No. 19,140.)

PAYMENT OF MORTGAGE TAX—PAROL AGREEMENT BY MORTGAGOR—FORFEITURE OF INTEREST.

A contemporaneous parol promise by a mortgagor to pay the mortgage tax does not invalidate the stipulations for interest, under Const. art. 13, § 5, providing that every contract obligating a debtor to pay the tax upon money loaned shall, in that respect, and as to any interest specified therein, be void. Garoutte and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by George W. Daw against William Niles and John B. Niles to foreclose a mortgage. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. W. Hutton and Minor & Woodward, for appellants. Albert M. Stephens, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the payment of a promissory note for $10,000, payable 10 years after date, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and containing a stipulation to the effect that if the interest is not punctually paid the principal and accrued interest shall become immediately due and payable, at the option of the holder. Nearly four years having elapsed after the execution of the note, without the payment of any part of the principal or interest, the plaintiff exercised his option to treat the whole amount as immediately due, and sued to foreclose. The defendants, by way of defense to the action, allege that at the time of the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, and as a part of the same transaction and contract, it was agreed between the plaintiff and the makers of the note and mortgage that they (the mortgagors) should and would pay and discharge all taxes and assessments which might be assessed or levied upon said money or mortgage, anything in said promissory note or mortgage, or either of them, to the contrary, notwithstanding. And it is further alleged that said agreement was knowingly made and omitted from said mortgage with the intent to evade the provisions of section 5 of article 13 of the state constitution, and on that ground defendants deny that by their failure to pay the alleged interest on said note the same became or is due or payable. In other words, they take the position that, on the facts alleged in their answer, no interest can ever become due on the note, and no suit to collect the principal can be commenced short of 10 years from its date. This position is undoubtedly sustained by our decision in the recent case of Burbridge v. Lemmert, 99 Cal. 493, 32 Pac. 310; but the difference between that case and this is that there the agreement to pay the taxes on the mortgagee's interest in the land was in writing, while here it is only claimed to have been by parol; and the question is not as to the sufficiency of the defense, as pleaded, but is wholly with respect to the competency of the evidence offered to sustain it.

At the trial, one of the defendants and joint makers of the note and mortgage, having been called and sworn as a witness on behalf of the defendants, was asked the following question: "Did you and your brother, John B. Niles, have any agreement with the plaintiff with reference to the payment by you and your brother of the taxes to be assessed or levied upon the mortgage set forth in the complaint, or the money secured thereby?" To which the plaintiff objected upon the grounds, among others, that it was incompetent, and that oral evidence was inadmissible for the purpose of contradicting or varying the terms of the note and mortgage, and that no oral agreement could be shown, binding the mortgagors to pay the taxes upon the mortgage, or upon the money thereby secured. The attorneys for defendants having admitted that there was no agreement in writing respecting the payment of said taxes, the court sustained plaintiff's objection to the question, and also to the further and more formal offer of the defendants to prove the allegations of the answer as above set forth. Thereupon, the cause was submitted for decision, and the decree of foreclosure was entered, including a direction to pay to the plaintiff, out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, the principal of the note, with accrued interest, counsel fees, and costs. The defendants appeal from the judgment upon a record showing the facts as here stated, and the question to be determined is whether the superior court erred in excluding evidence of an oral agreement to pay the taxes on the debt or mortgage. The appellants do not question the general rule as to the inadmissibility of oral evidence to add to, contradict, or vary a written agreement, but they claim to be within one of the well-understood exceptions to the rule.

Section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure states the rule and its exceptions as follows: "When the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms, and therefore there can be between the parties and their representatives, or successors in interest, no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing, except in the following cases: (1) Where a mistake or imperfection of the writing is put in issue by the pleadings. (2) Where the validity of the agreement is the fact in dispute. But this section does not exclude other evidence of the circumstances under which the agreement was made or to which it relates, as defined in section eighteen hundred and sixty, or to explain an extrinsic ambiguity, or to establish illegality or fraud. The term 'agreement' includes deeds and wills, as well as contracts between parties."

The contention of appellants is that the validity of their agreement to pay interest was the fact in dispute; that the parol promise which they offered to prove would have rendered said agreement void; and, therefore, that their offer came within the second exception to the rule. This conclusion seems to be inevitable if it be true, as the argument assumes, that the alleged parol promise to pay the taxes would have rendered the agreement to pay interest void, and the question therefore is narrowed down to this: Does a parol promise by a mortgagor to pay the mortgage tax invalidate the written stipulations for interest contained in the note and mortgage? This is a very serious question, the decision of which is fraught with the gravest consequences, not only to the entire business community, but more especially to those whose interests or necessities compel them to become borrowers of money. To hold that such a parol promise does invalidate the written agreement is not merely to punish actual transgressions of the supposed prohibition of the constitution; it is to set at large every written agreement by which the payment of money is or shall hereafter be secured; it is to introduce doubt and uncertainty where now is certainty and security; it is to multiply litigation, and to make possible infinitely more fraud than it can possibly prevent,—and all this for the sake of a more than doubtful advantage to necessitous borrowers, for, since there is no limit imposed either by the laws or constitution of California to the rate of interest that may be exacted by the lender of money, it would seem that any additional risk to which the business of lending is subjected can only result in an increase of the rates of interest. But the question before us is one of constitutional construction, and must be decided without reference to the argumentum ab inconvenienti, unless the provision in question is of doubtful or ambiguous import.

Section 5 of article 13 of the constitution reads as follows: "Every contract hereafter made, by which a debtor is obligated to pay any tax or assessment on money loaned, or on any mortgage, deed of trust, or other lien, shall, as to any interest specified therein, and as to such tax or assessment, be null and void." The parol promise of the defendants in this case does not come within the literal terms of this provision of the constitution, nor, we think, within that natural and unforced construction of its terms for which they contend. The language of the section is not happily chosen, and, literally taken, involves an absurdity, for it speaks of a contract which obligates the debtor, and is at the same time void. What is evidently meant, however, is a contract which, but for the invalidating effect of this provision, would obligate the debtor to pay the tax, and this contract must be a part of the contract to pay the interest, for it is the interest specified therein, i. e. in the contract to pay the tax, which is alone invalidated. Upon these conditions, it is legally impossible that a parol promise to pay taxes should invalidate a written promise to pay interest, for such parol promise could never obligate the debtor. Code Civ. Proc. § 1639. It could never be proved against him under the rule of evidence above quoted (Id. § 1856), for the reason therein stated,—that, with the exceptions enumerated, there is a conclusive presumption that the writing contains all the terms of the contract. But we would not be willing to rest our decision on this technical and literal construction of the clause in question, or upon its evident conformity to the whole tenor and natural import of the language used. We concede that if, upon a comprehensive view of the several provisions of the constitution relating to this subject, there is disclosed a well-defined policy and intention on the part of the framers of the constitution, which is capable of enforcement, we should give to this particular clause a construction in harmony with such policy, and an effect which will not only prevent any direct infringement of its terms, but every indirect attempt to evade them. The appellants contend that the policy of the constitution in this particular is to protect improvident and necessitous borrowers from the exactions of greedy money lenders; that its inhibition of contracts by which the debtor is obligated to pay the mortgage tax is in perfect analogy with the usury laws; and that, on the same grounds, and to the same extent, that parol evidence was admissible to prove that a contract was usurious, it must be admissible to prove a contract by the debtor to pay the mortgage tax. Conceding, for the present, the correctness of these propositions, let us see how far the authorities bear out the claim of counsel as to the admissibility of parol evidence to sustain a plea of usury.

At the outset of their argument, they quote the language used by Lord Mansfield in delivering the opinion of the court in Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. 114, "And, where the real truth is a loan of money, the wit of man cannot find a shift to take it out of the statute," and also a saying attributed to Lord Coke: "To them that lend money my caveat is that neither directly nor indirectly, by art or cunning invention, they take above six in the hundred, for they that seeke by sleight to creepe out of these statutes will deceive themselves, and repent in the end." Although unable to verify the quotation, we have no doubt that this language is correctly attributed to Lord Coke, for the first clause of the sentence contains almost a literal statement of the terms of the usury statutes, and the last is simply a variation of the statement subsequently made by Lord Mansfield of a perfectly familiar doctrine especially applicable to the laws against usury. But neither Lord Coke nor Lord Mansfield, nor any other English court or judge, so far as we are advised, ever held a case like this to be within the doctrine so stated. We have not, of course, been able to run through the almost countless cases in which the plea of usury has been interposed; but, so far as our research has extended, we have found no English case which sustains the contention of appellants on this precise point, and the industry of counsel seems to have been equally fruitless. What they have found, and all that they have found, are cases like that above cited from Cowper's Reports, of which there are a great number, all illustrating the precise meaning and limiting the application of the general statements of Coke and Mansfield above quoted. When a money lender took a written obligation by which his debtor expressly promised to pay the principal of the loan with more than legal interest, the case was one to which the maxim "res ipsa loquitur" applied, and of course the doctrine in question had no application; but there were a large number of cases in which a plea of usury was interposed to an action on a contract by which the debtor ostensibly agreed to pay money upon some other consideration than a loan, or by which he agreed to pay more than he had received, and these were the shifts and devices to which the sayings above quoted referred. The case of Floyer v. Edwards, supra, is a good illustration. The plaintiff was a refiner, and sold the defendant gold and silver wire upon an agreement made at the time of the sale that, in case the price was not paid in three months, the defendant should pay to the plaintiff a half-penny an ounce per month for so long a time as the money should remain unpaid. If this was a bona fide sale, the agreement was lawful, and in strict accordance with the custom of the Goldsmiths' Company, although a half-penny per ounce was far above the lawful rate of interest, while, if it was not a sale, but in fact a loan disguised as a sale for the purpose of evading the statute, the form in which it had been put would not protect it. The case was tried before Lord Mansfield at nisi prius, and parol evidence as to the negotiations preceding the transaction admitted for the purpose of determining whether it was in fact a loan or sale. Under his lordship's instructions the jury found for the plaintiff, and the rule for a new trial was discharged by the court in banc. In the course of his opinion, Lord Mansfield used the language above quoted, which, in that connection, meant only this: That, where the real consideration of a promise to pay money is a loan, that consideration may be proved, notwithstanding the written contract has recited a sale of goods as the consideration of the promise. But, of course, it was a matter of familiar knowledge to Lord Mansfield that not only this particular device, but a great number of others, had been practiced by money lenders from the very beginning of the legislation against usury, for the purpose of evading the statutory penalties, and no doubt he had those practices in mind. Among the earliest and most common of these contrivances was the grant of annuities or rent charges, redeemable and otherwise. A large number of the decisions upon such cases are reviewed by Chief Justice Marshall in his opinion in Scott v. Lloyd, 9 Pet. 418, where such a grant was held to have been a mere cover for a loan at usurious rates. Another device was to compel the borrower to buy from the lender a half interest in a clock, to be kept by the lender, or an impossible wardrobe, or other article of furniture, or a horse or a slave, or goods of any kind, at an extravagant price, and including this price in the note or bond for the money actually loaned. Another was to exact a premium for the loan at the time of making the advance, or, in other words, to take a note for a larger sum than was actually loaned. Another was to exact a bill of exchange for the amount of the debt or loan, with a premium added largely in excess of the rate of discount on such bills. There were many others, as the decided cases show; but they all possessed one feature in common, and it was that particular trait which gave point and force to the observation of Lord Coke and Lord Mansfield, and which clearly indicates the extent of its just application. In every one of the cases to which we have referred, it will be seen that the action was upon a contract,—generally in writing,—which was by its terms lawful and legitimate, and not only capable of proof against the debtor, but legally enforceable according to its terms, if valid in fact as well as in appearance. In other words, the lender had so "contrived" that he could actually enforce the payment of unlawful interest against an unwilling debtor, and thus defeat the purpose of the statute, unless the debtor was allowed to prove, not a collateral verbal promise of his own, having no validity or force whatever, but a concrete fact outside of the agreement, and tending to show that the ostensible agreement upon which the action was founded was a sham, or that the consideration or declared object of the contract was not its real consideration or object. In such cases the courts were confronted with a dilemma in which a choice of evils was necessary. They had either to make an inroad upon or an exception to a most salutary rule of evidence, or they must lend themselves to the enforcement of contracts, the purpose and effect of which was to frustrate the statute. In this situation there was, of course, but one thing to do, or rather there was but one precedent to follow, for the difficulty was one that had been encountered by the courts long before the usury statutes, and had been solved by making the necessary exception to the rule of evidence. But this exception was made no broader than was necessary in order to avoid the greater evil of enforcing a contract founded upon an illegal or insufficient consideration, or entered into for the accomplishment of an unlawful object. There was no occasion to extend the exception to a case like this, in which the verbal promise sought to be proved could never have had the slightest force or validity, and which, if made, gave the lender no advantage, and subjected the debtor to no liability. This distinction is clearly and forcibly stated by Chief Justice Parker in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Massachusetts in the case of Butterfield v. Kidder, 8 Pick. 512,—a case which involved the precise point under consideration here. His opinion is short, and we cannot do better than quote it in full. He says: "The verbal promise to pay eight per cent. when the note was made, by which there was a promise to pay the money lent and lawful interest only, ought not to vitiate the note, for it was wholly without consideration, and cannot be taken as part of the contract, which was in writing, and must be considered as evidence of the intention of the parties. Supposing the agreement to pay and receive more than six per cent., the plaintiff could recover nothing but what is promised by the note. The additional promise was therefore wholly nugatory, and cannot affect the note. If it be said that by this contrivance the statute may be avoided, the answer is that, if that verbal promise should be carried into effect by paying unlawful interest, the taking would be an offense, and the party would become liable for the penalty. But by this contract now in suit there is not reserved or secured more than six per cent., and therefore the contract is not void."

It cannot be denied, however, that in some cases this distinction, and the principle upon which it is founded, have been overlooked. An instance of this is presented by the South Carolina case of Willard v. Reeder, 2 McCord, 369, which, like the Massachusetts case last cited, involved the precise point under discussion. Another case involving the same point, and decided the same way, is Lear v. Yarnell (decided by the Kentucky court of appeals) 3 A. K. Marsh. 419. Disbrow v. Crawford (a case decided by the supreme court of New Jersey) 18 N. J. Law, 325, is to the same effect, and so is the case of Gilmore v. Woolock (decided by the supreme court of Wisconsin) 13 Wis. 589. With these exceptions, none of the cases cited by counsel sustain them upon the point under discussion; and, as to these cases, we can only say that the views upon which they were decided do not command our assent. In the South Carolina case no authority is cited, and no reason given, to sustain the conclusion of the court, except one that begs the whole question. The court assumes that an infraction of the statute is consummated by the mere giving of an oral promise of no force or efficiency whatever, while, if our view and that of the supreme court of Massachusetts is correct, there results from such a promise no infraction of the law. In the Kentucky case, also, no authority is cited, and the court reasons in a circle to the same conclusion reached by the South Carolina court. In the New Jersey and Wisconsin cases the decision is rested upon the supposed authority of a number of decisions cited in the respective opinions, but a reference to those decisions will show that they lend a very slight support to the proposition under discussion. The first case cited by the New Jersey court is Fussil v. Brookes, 12 E. C. L. 594, 2 Car. & P. 318. The report is of the proceedings on the trial at nisi prius before Abbott, C. J. The defendant proved the actual payment of interest in excess of the lawful rate, but the court held that this did not avoid the bond without proof that the payment was in pursuance of an agreement made at or before the execution of the bond, but, if the jury believed that it was made at or before the execution of the bond, then the bond was void. The verdict was for the plaintiff. This case, it will be observed, is in precise accord with the decision of the Massachusetts court, and establishes the proposition that, where a parol promise to pay more than legal interest is relied upon to sustain a plea of usury, two things must occur: There must be the fact of actual payment of usurious interest, and there must have been a promise in pursuance of which the interest has been paid. Clearly, this case does not support the proposition to which it is cited, and the same may be said of six out of the seven other cases cited in the same connection. In one only (Merrills v. Law, 9 Cow. 65) was the question involved, and the decision of the supreme court, which was afterwards reversed by the court of errors (6 Wend. 268), was mainly upon a question of practice. Each of the other cases involved one of the devices above referred to. In the case in 8 N. J. Law, 233 (Clark v. Badgley), for instance, the lender sold the borrower a half interest in a clock as a part of the same transaction, and was to keep and repurchase the clock at about half the selling price. In the Wisconsin case, also, there is the same indiscriminate citation of cases which do not support the decision, along with two or three which do support it,—a sure indication that the court had entirely missed the distinction so clearly made in Butterfield v. Kidder, supra.

We have carefully examined all the other cases cited by the appellants, and find that, so far as they involve the plea of usury, they were, without exception, devices by which the borrower had been compelled to enter into an apparently valid contract in writing to pay usurious interest under the guise of an annuity, rent charge, purchase price of land, or something of the kind, or to sign a note or bill for more than the amount of the loan or debt. They are all, in other words, easily distinguishable from this case. In the case of Stein v. Swensen, 46 Minn. 360, 49 N. W. 55, for instance,—and we refer to this case because it comes nearer the point than any of the others,—the borrower clearly proved the fact that at the time of the loans and renewals he had been compelled to pay various sums in excess of legal interest, and in that connection was allowed to offer parol evidence of the understanding upon which such payments had been made. The case was in principle like Fussil v. Brookes, supra. In the cases of Buffendeau v. Brooks, 28 Cal. 642, and Agricultural Works v. Estes (Cal.) 32 Pac. 940, parol evidence was admitted for the purpose of showing that written contracts, apparently valid, had been entered into for unlawful purposes.

From this review of the authorities, it very clearly appears that the exception to the general rule of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856) does include evidence of a parol agreement which is part of a written agreement, when the effect of the parol agreement is to invalidate the written agreement. But the proposition that a parol promise to do an unlawful thing will invalidate the written promise of the same party to do what is entirely lawful has little authority, and less reason, to support it. It is, of course, very different when the written promise of one party is made in consideration of an oral agreement of the other party to do an unlawful act, as in Buffendeau v. Brooks, supra. In such case the illegality of the consideration may undoubtedly be proved as a defense to an action on the written contract, because it necessarily invalidates it. This is the case to which the second exception to the rule applies.

But even if we were satisfied with the doctrine contended for by appellants, as applied to the usury laws, there would still be a difficulty in applying it to the provisions of our constitution relating to the mortgage tax. We should be compelled to disregard their strict terms in favor of a large and liberal construction in furtherance of the policy of protecting borrowers against the greedy exactions of lenders. Before discarding a salutary rule of evidence, designed to prevent frauds and perjuries, in pursuit of any object, however laudable, it is worth while to consider whether such object is possible of attainment. If we should hold as appellants ask us to hold, there is no doubt that we should open to dispute and litigation an immense number of transactions which are otherwise secure against attack. There is as little doubt that such litigation would invite more or less falsehood and perjury, and result in some instances in the grossest injustice. All these things would come inevitably, but no single borrower would be protected or aided in the slightest degree against the exactions of lenders. As to existing parol contracts to pay the mortgage tax, if any such there be, they are simply void, and the borrower needs no protection from the courts. As to future transactions, no grasping money lender, accustomed to the business and aware of the constitutional provisions in question, will ever take a contract, written or verbal, for the payment of the mortgage tax, not only because such a contract is void, but for the all-sufficient reason that he has no need to do so in order to exact all that the borrower can be induced to submit to. He can take all that the traffic will bear in the shape of interest, the rate of which is unlimited either by the law or the constitution. By its own inherent defect in failing to limit the rate of interest, the supposed policy of the constitution is rendered incapable of enforcement by any action of the courts. All that they could accomplish by upholding the doctrine for which appellants contend would be to subject unwary lenders, in isolated cases, to a heavy penalty for accepting a promise of no obligation upon the borrower, and worse than useless to the lender,—an arrangement much more likely to originate in the craft of the borrower than in the greed of the lender. It is scarcely worth while to stretch the terms of the constitution, or broaden the exceptions to a salutary rule of evidence, in order to attain an object so inadequate. We think the superior court did not err in the ruling complained of, or in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; McFARLAND, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I am compelled to dissent from the views and conclusion of the court declared in this case. If I clearly grasp the grounds upon which the court has based its conclusion, they are, in the main, that this oral agreement offered to be proven was collateral to the principal contract, and also made without consideration. To my mind, neither of these positions has any support whatever. The oral agreement was neither collateral, nor was it without consideration. The consideration for it was the loan of the money, and this agreement to pay the taxes was based upon that consideration as fully and completely as the agreement to pay the interest on the loan, or to repay the loan itself. The agreement was not collateral. It was as much a part of the original contract entered into between these parties as any other covenant contained therein. It was so alleged to be in the answer, and so offered to be proven at the trial. Again, this case, in all essentials, is an exact photograph of the case of Burbridge v. Lemmert, 99 Cal. 493, 32 Pac. 310, except that the agreement to pay the taxes was there made in writing, —a writing distinct from the mortgage. That writing was collateral to the contract and without consideration, if this oral agreement is collateral and without consideration, yet this court declared that such writing rendered the agreement in the mortgage to pay interest void. The error of the court seems to lie in assuming that the writing is conclusive evidence of the terms of the contract, and such appears to be the view of Chief Justice Parker in Butterfield v. Kidder, 8 Pick. 512, as well as we are able to ascertain those views from the very meager opinion of the court in that case; and that case is relied upon as the sole authority to support the judgment here declared. It was so decided under the peculiar and special provisions of the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts, and the decision, without doubt, must be read in the light of such statutes, for the principle there declared stands alone as an adjudication. In Dunscomb v. Bunker, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 8, reference is made to Butterfield v. Kidder, and it is there stated that the rule is different in New York; citing Merrills v. Law, 9 Cow. 65,—a case which is squarely opposed to the principal opinion of this court.

The elementary doctrine that parol testimony is not admissible, either to add to or subtract from, or in any way contradict or vary, the terms of a written instrument, is conceded and recognized by all courts, and, in conjunction with certain exceptions to the rule, is substantially stated in section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to wit: "When the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms, and therefore there can be between the parties and their representatives, or successors in interest, no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing, except in the following cases: * * * (2) Where the validity of the agreement is the fact in dispute. But this section does not exclude other evidence of the circumstances under which the agreement was made * * * to explain an extrinsic ambiguity, or to establish illegality or fraud." It is here proposed to show that a certain agreement of mortgage is void as to the interest specified therein, by showing by parol that one term of the agreement which in itself was unlawful was intentionally omitted therefrom. This provision of the statute in effect says that the terms of the agreement, as evidenced by the writing, are not conclusive as showing all its terms, and that other and additional terms may be shown by parol when the validity of the agreement is attacked. The validity of the agreement is here attacked, and the exception to the general principle forms the true rule. It appears to be the very case where the statute authorizes us to look beyond the contents of the writing for the purpose of ascertaining the actual terms of the agreement. The intent and purpose of the provision of the constitution was to protect borrowers, in their necessities, from the exactions of money loaners, and the provision is based upon the same lines, and owes its enactment to the same reasons, that caused the passage of the usury statutes found in nearly every state of the Union. It is charged that this agreement was entered into in this manner for the purpose of evading a provision of the constitution, and it would be anomalous if the offending party could so hedge himself about by writings as to prevent a court from reaching such iniquity. Lord Coke said: "To them that lend money my caveat is that neither directly nor indirectly, by art or cunning invention, they take above six in the hundred, for they that seeke by sleight to creepe out of these statutes will deceive themselves, and repent in the end." We are unable to discern any difference in principle between the present case and those cases arising under usurious contracts. In that class of cases the doctrine is settled beyond all question that contemporaneous oral agreements are admissible for the purpose of showing the usurious character of the contract, and thereby destroying its validity. In Willard v. Reeder, 2 McCord, 369, the syllabus states the point in the decision as follows: "Where a person borrowed money, and gave his note for the amount, with lawful interest, and at the same time made a verbal promise to pay five per cent. more interest, making twelve per cent., the court held, upon an action being brought on the note, that it was usurious and void, although it was left to the borrower's honor only whether he would pay more than legal interest." In the opinion of the court the following language is found: "But it is said this promise did not constitute an agreement, because it was merely honorary, and imposed no obligation on the defendant. This course of reasoning would lead to the ridiculous result that a party could not incur the forfeitures and penalty attached to the usury because the act by which it was consummated imposed no obligation. Agreements against law have the form, but not the binding efficacy, of contracts, and consequently, all the obligation they impose must, of necessity, be only honorary." In Stein v. Swensen, 46 Minn. 364, 49 N. W. 55, the same principle is again declared, and Gilfillan, C. J., said: "As there is no device or shift on the part of the lender to evade the statute, in or behind which the law will not look in order to ascertain the real nature of the transaction, as no act, however formal, no instrument, however solemnly executed, will stand in the way of the court getting at the truth, in order to determine whether there has been an attempt to evade the law, it was competent to prove the oral agreement indicated by the question." In 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 91, the exception to the general rule as to the admission of oral testimony bearing on written instruments, is stated as follows: "Provided, that any of the following matters may be proved: Fraud, intimidation, illegality, want of due execution, * * * or any other matter which, if proved, would produce any effect upon the validity of any document, or any part of it, or which would entitle any person to any judgment, decree, or order relating thereto." Wharton, in his work on Evidence (volume 2, § 935), says: "On the same reasoning it may be true that the contract embodied by the writing is illegal, and therefore void. If void, it is not a contract. To exclude evidence because it is a contract is to assume the very point in liti gation. Nor can any form of instrument of indebtedness preclude a debtor from setting up usury."

There is no sound reason to be urged why the present case does not come squarely within the principle declared by these authorities. If the oral evidence offered in this case was properly rejected, it was wrong to admit it against the practicers of usury, and thus the practical application of those statutes would be defeated by the simplest of devices. The penalties attached to a violation of this provision of our constitution are severe, and it is not likely that parties seeking to violate it would publish their wrong to the world by inserting this void stipulation in the original instrument designed for record. Neither is it probable that they would commit their purpose to writing at all. It would most naturally be done in secret, and in parol, for the borrower's parol agreement to pay the taxes upon the mortgage would be just as valuable to the money lender, and probably more valuable, than if the stipulation were incorporated in the mortgage itself. The agreement, however made, would be void in law, and its value would depend solely upon the honor of the borrower. Again, the provision of the constitution is very broad. It uses the words "every contract." It therefore clearly includes oral contracts for the loan of money not evidenced by writing of any character. Such loans would constitute solvent credits, and it cannot for a moment be contended that, while the contracts of loan may be oral, yet an agreement to pay taxes by the borrower upon such loan could not also be oral. It is thus apparent that, under certain contracts coming within the purview of the provision of the constitution, the idea of oral agreements to pay the taxes was naturally and necessarily present in the minds of the framers of the instrument.

Counsel in his argument, and the opinion of the court, to some extent, has strongly animadverted upon the depressing results to the general prosperity of the state, and to the special hardships which will fall upon the borrowers of money, if the construction which we have given this provision of the constitution shall be declared the law. In answer to such an argument, we can only say that, by reason of counsel's warmth and earnestness in the advocacy of his client's cause, we hope and believe his fears in this regard are highly exaggerated; but, whatever may be the result, we have no power to add to or subtract from the language of this section of the constitution. We must construe it as it stands enacted, and the question as to the wisdom and policy of this provision is not a matter for our consideration. This court is not the forum to administer relief for evil in the law, if evil there be. For all the purposes of this court, it is sufficient that it is a provision of the organic law of the land, and as such it is our duty to uphold and sustain it whenever assailed. As was said by Beatty, C. J., in discussing another provision of the constitution, in Sheehy v. Shinn (Cal.) 37 Pac. 393: "The provision of the constitution was aimed at the substance of these abuses, and not at the form. * * * To give effect to the constitution, it is as much the duty of the court to see that it is not evaded as that it is not directly violated." If we hold that this provision may be so easily evaded as is here contemplated, its repeal, for all practical purposes, will take effect from the date of such holding. Lord Mansfield said: "Where the real truth is the loan of money, the wit of man cannot find a shift to take it out of the statute." By this decision it requires but little wit to find a shift to avoid this provision of the constitution.

It is proposed to show in this case that this oral agreement to pay the tax upon the mortgage was a part and parcel of the principal contract, and that it was omitted from the contract evidenced by the writing for the very purpose of evading the provision of the constitution. We think the evidence admissible. To countenance any other practice would render the object of the provision entirely abortive. A provision of the constitution cannot be trifled with in that way, and the result of every such attempt, when the latter is brought to the attention of the court, must be that the money lender will be overwhelmed in his own folly.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE.

FAULKNER v. RONDONI et al. (No. 18,-255.)

WATER FOR IRRIGATION—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHTS—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—CONFLICTING STATEMENTS.

1. The fact that the owner of land on a fork of a stream used all the water in such fork does not show such an invasion of the rights of a prior appropriator of water from the stream below the two forks as to give to the former a prescriptive right to use all the water in the fork, the lower owner having always received enough water for his purposes through the supply coming from the other fork of the stream.

2. In an action to determine the right to the water of a stream, defendant's witness was asked on cross-examination if he had not stated that plaintiff's right was inferior to defendant's. The witness denied having so stated, nor had he, on his direct examination, testified as to defendant's right. Held, that it could not be proven, to impeach him, that he had so stated, as such declaration, not being evidence against plaintiff, was not relevant to the issues.

3. Though it is a question of fact as to the amount of water actually diverted by a person claiming a right thereto by prescription, yet, as it is a matter of common knowledge that persons build their ditches with a view to the quantity of water needed, slight testimony is sufficient to show that the full capacity of the ditch was used.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by James Faulkner against Antonio Rondoni and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. J. Ridge and A. Burrors, for appellants. C. W. Kitts, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to quiet title to a certain ditch and water right, to recover damages for the diversion of water therefrom, and for an injunction restraining defendants from such diversion. Plaintiff had a decree establishing his title to the ditch extending from his ranch, therein described, to a certain stream, known as "South Wolf Creek," and his prior right at all times to divert from said South Wolf creek, and to conduct the same through said ditch, water to the extent of 31 inches, measured under a 6-inch pressure; that the rights of defendants in and to the waters of said stream and its tributaries are inferior and subordinate to those of plaintiff; enjoining the defendants from interfering with said water to the extent of plaintiff's right, and awarding damages against defendants for $100, together with costs of suit; and further decreeing defendants to be entitled to use, for the purposes of irrigation upon the Paro and Rondoni ranches, so much of the waters of said South Wolf creek and its branches as remains in excess of the amount decreed to plaintiff. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and written findings filed. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

It was admitted at the trial that plaintiff and his grantors have been the owners of and in the possession of that certain land or ranch described in the complaint since 1865, and that plaintiff has been such owner and so in possession since 1877. In 1867 Nathan Wheeler, the predecessor in interest of plaintiff, constructed a ditch and flume extending from said ranch to Wolf creek (sometimes called "Dry Creek"), tapping said creek about 400 feet below the forks thereof, by means of which he diverted the waters of said creek, and conducted the same to said ranch, where they were used for irrigation and domestic purposes; and he and his successors in interest, including the plaintiff, have ever since used said water for said purposes. Wolf creek and its tributaries are natural water courses, and during a portion of the year afford a large volume of water; but during certain seasons of the year, and especially in the months of July, August, and September, the water in said creek becomes scarce, and at times there are not 31 inches of water in said creek, at the head of plaintiff's ditch. Originally, no dam was necessary to divert the water into plaintiff's ditch; but with the lapse of time the channel of the creek, from natural causes, or from mining or other causes, has been cut down and lowered so that a dam is now necessary to divert the water. Defendants are the owners, as tenants in common, of the ranch described in their joint answer, situate upon said Wolf creek, at and near the head of plaintiff's ditch, the title to which comes to them from the Central Pacific Railroad Company through a deed executed by said company to Alexander Paro, September 2, 1873. Said ranch is designated as the "Paro Ranch." The defendant Antonio Rondoni is the owner of a ranch situated upon the forks of Wolf creek, above the Paro ranch, the title to which he derives by sundry mesne conveyances, from said Central Pacific Railroad Company, under a deed dated April 8, 1871. Both the Paro ranch and the Rondoni ranch are under cultivation, and defendants have facilities for diverting, and have been accustomed to divert, water from the forks of said Wolf creek to irrigate their growing crops on their said ranches. The evidence shows that on the 7th day of September, 1872, Alexander Paro, the predecessor of defendants in the Paro ranch, conveyed to Nathan Wheeler, under whom plaintiff claims, by deed of bargain and sale, the water ditch, with the water rights and water thereunto belonging and therewith connected, together with the right to keep said ditch in repair, and to enter upon the lands of the grantor for that purpose. As before stated, the ditch of plaintiff had its head upon, and in part crossed, the Paro ranch. Whether or not there had been any controversy as to the right to the water or to the right of way for the ditch prior to the conveyance does not appear. Defendants, in their answer, set out a prescriptive right in themselves to the use of all the water of both forks of South Wolf creek, upon the Paro ranch; and defendant Rondoni pleads a like right to the waters of the south fork or east fork of said creek, for use upon the Rondoni ranch situate on said fork. The case, so far as the facts are concerned, must turn (1) upon priority of appropriation; (2) upon the prescriptive rights, if any, of the several parties.

Near the close of appellants' brief, it is urged that "the entire judgment disregards the riparian rights of the defendants." There were good reasons for so doing. The complaint, after stating the date of the appropriation by plaintiff's predecessor, avers "that, at the time of the construction of said ditch and the appropriation of said water, the land over which said ditch ran, and over which said South Wolf creek or Dry creek ran, were open, unsurveyed, unappropriated government lands of the United States." The answers failed to deny this allegation, and the court found in consonance with it.

It was not necessary to find upon a fact admitted by the pleadings, but, had the court found against the admission, it would, if material, have been ground for reversal. The evidence showed the lands of defendants to be riparian to South Wolf creek or its tributaries, but, if they have any riparian rights to the water of said creek, they are subordinate and subject to the rights of appropriators who diverted such water prior to the divestment of the government title, and who have continued to use such water pursuant to such appropriation for a useful purpose. We do not know judicially that the land in question is within the limits of a railroad grant, or that, if within such limits, it is land which the railroad company could take under the grant, or, in the absence of proof, that such railroad company ever had any title thereto. The court found in favor of plaintiff as a prior appropriator, and upon his claim of a prescriptive right to 31 inches of water, and against the prescriptive rights of defendants, as against plaintiff, set up in their answers. The evidence was, it is thought, amply sufficient to support these findings. There are in the very nature of the claims set up to the use of water, in cases of this character, certain elements of uncertainty which cannot be eliminated. Mountain streams, which furnish large quantities of water during a portion of the year, and which is appropriated by many persons, during the dry season, or in years of drought, dwindle to mere rills, or cease to flow. Witnesses who have observed the annual user of the water by given individuals for many years are prone to forget as to the nonuser, when the quantity is small, from the simple fact that the use impresses the mind, while its absence is not noticed by the casual observer. These, and some other elements of uncertainty which might be mentioned, render the task of determining the exact facts in a given case extremely difficult. A careful review of the evidence and admitted facts in the present case leads to the conclusion that upon all the salient points the court below deduced the facts from the testimony with a large degree of accuracy.

Appellants contend that the finding that plaintiff's ditch would carry 31 inches of water is unsupported by the evidence. In support of this contention, we are referred to the testimony of C. E. Uren, a civil engineer, who testified in substance that a short distance below the measuring box there was an old flume, which had a capacity of only 13½ to 15 inches under a 6-inch pressure. He stated that the capacity of the ditch above the flume was 35 inches. The witness speaks of the grade of the flume, but the record is silent as to what that grade was, thus omitting an important factor essential to a calculation of the capacity of the ditch. On the other hand, plaintiff and Alcorn, a witness on his behalf, testified that the ditch would carry 31 inches, and that the flume would carry as much as the ditch. There was also evidence (1) that plaintiff used a portion of the water to irrigate above this flume; (2) that, at the time when Uren probably measured the flume, it was split, and not in repair, and that another board was put on to raise it two inches higher. Alcorn, who was entirely familiar with the ditch and had charge of it for a time, says he measured the flume, and "it was 8 inches bottom, and 6 inches sides." That this was the size of the flume when in its normal condition, and that a portion of the side was removed from some cause when Uren measured it, may well be inferred from the evidence.

The objection that there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff or his grantors have continuously, from 1867 to 1891, diverted into their ditch so much of the water as the same would carry, etc., cannot be maintained. The statement specifies that there was evidence to show that, since 1866–67, Wheeler and his successors in interest, including the plaintiff, have each year used the water through the ditch for irrigation and domestic purposes upon plaintiff's ranch. Several of the witnesses alluded to the water being scarce at plaintiff's dam by saying there was not enough to fill his ditch; and plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, said in substance that he had sufficient water to irrigate his ranch until 1891, and that it required his ditch full to irrigate his crop. If these assertions of the witness were correct, it must follow that his ditch was accustomed to carry water to the extent of its capacity, when it was to be had. No point was made on this question at the trial; hence, we need not expect to find the evidence full on that head. Men usually construct ditches of this character with a view to the quantity of water needed or to be had, and not for amusement; and when constructed and used, while the quantity of water actually diverted is a question of fact, the user of the quantity their ditches will carry is so natural, and so nearly in accord with our common knowledge, that slight testimony is sufficient to establish the fact.

Passing a number of objections to the findings, which are merely technical and unimportant, or, as in case of one of them, directly in the face of the facts, as stipulated in open court, and we come to the question most elaborately discussed by appellants in their brief, viz. that relating to the findings of the court against the prescriptive rights of defendants, claimed to have been acquired by them by an adverse user of the water for a period in excess of five years. The right which is acquired in and to the waters of a stream by a prior appropriation thereof may be lost, either wholly or in part, by the adverse possession and user of another; and when such adverse claimant has had the continued, notorious, uninterrupted, and adverse enjoyment of the water, or of a portion thereof, during the period prescribed by the statute of limitations for entry upon lands (which in this state is five years), the law will presume a grant of the right so held and enjoyed by him. Water Co. v. Crary, 25 Cal. 504; American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 361; Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135; Cox v. Clough, 70 Cal. 345, 11 Pac. 732. The right acquired by prescription is measured by the extent of the continuous enjoyment. The right claimed must be adverse; that is to say, "it must have been asserted under claim of title, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the person having the prior right, and must have been uninterrupted." Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. 645; American Co. v. Bradford, supra. "In order to constitute a right by prescription, there must have been such an invasion of the rights of the party against whom it is claimed that he would have had ground of action against the intruder." Water Co. v. Hancock, supra; Anaheim Water Co. v. Semi-Tropic Water Co., 64 Cal. 185, 30 Pac. 623. The glaring defect in appellants' case, under which they claim a prescriptive right, is involved in the proposition last quoted. Their argument is ingenious, if not sound. It may be paraphrased thus: Defendants for over 10 years have irrigated their ranch held by them as tenants in common, during each year, with water from the two forks of South Wolf creek. Defendant Rondoni has continuously, for 10 years, irrigated the ranch owned by him on the south fork of said stream, and, when necessary so to do, has used all the water of said south or east fork for that purpose; and, as to the last assertion, there is no conflict in the evidence. This must be admitted as literally true, but the conclusion drawn by appellants does not follow. The testimony shows that plaintiff's ditch has its head below the junction of the two forks of the stream; that during a portion of the year there is sufficient water in the stream for all the parties; that the north fork is the principal or larger branch, and furnishes most of the water; that prior to 1891 plaintiff had plenty of water, or, when it became short, defendants, upon being notified, turned it down. It came, no doubt, mainly from the north fork, but this could make no difference to the plaintiff. It was 31 inches of water to which he was entitled, and he was not injured, and could not complain that it came from one branch, and not from the other. There was no invasion of his rights, and he had no ground for an action, as long as he received the quantity of water to which he was entitled, and according to his testimony he did receive it until 1891. It follows that if, under such circumstances, Rondoni used all the water of the south fork, it was not, up to 1891, an invasion of the rights of the plaintiff, and hence afforded no foundation upon which to build a prescriptive right.

At the trial, counsel for appellants, upon the cross-examination of B. Alcorn, a witness who has testified for plaintiff, asked said witness if he had not stated to defendant Rondoni and Antonio Mirandi, at the house of Wheeler, during the summer of 1890, when the latter was sick, that he (the witness) knew all about the water, and could tell them as well as anybody else, and that Faulkner (the plaintiff) had the right to the water that came below the forks of the creek, but had no right to the water above the forks of the creek, and that Faulkner had no right to interfere with them as to the water above the forks of the creek. The witness, in answer, denied that he had so stated. Defendants thereafter called, as a witness on their behalf, defendant Rondoni, and offered to prove by him the truth of the alleged statement of Alcorn, as involved in the affirmative of the question put to him, to which counsel for the plaintiff objected as being immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and not pertinent to any issue raised by the pleadings, etc. The objection was sustained, an exception reserved, and the ruling is now assigned as error. Antonio Mirandi was also called as a witness, a like offer of proof made, like objections offered, a like ruling had, and exception taken, and a like error is assigned. It was said by Wallace, C. J., in People v. Devine, 44 Cal. 458: "A recognized rule, or rather qualification of the rule, governing the impeachment of the credit of a witness by proof of contradictory statements elsewhere made by him, is that the matter involved in the supposed contradiction must not itself be merely collateral in its character, but must be relevant to the issue being tried." People v. Webb, 70 Cal. 120, 11 Pac. 509; People v. Devine, supra; People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 112, 16 Pac. 537; People v. Furtado, 57 Cal. 346. Furst v. Railroad Co., 72 N. Y. 542, was an action against a street-car company for injury to a child by being run over. The conductor was called as a witness for defendant, but testified nothing as to the driver. On cross-examination he was asked, in substance, if he had not said to the father of plaintiff that it was the fault of the driver; that, had he looked, it would not have happened, etc. Replying in the negative, testimony was admitted to contradict him, and it was held error. In the present case the witness Alcorn had not testified as to any matter relating to the right to the water above the forks of South Wolf creek. His declaration out of court, made to third parties, and not in the presence of plaintiff, could not bind the latter, and was totally inadmissible for that purpose. It was not in contradiction of anything to which he had testified, was outside of legitimate cross-examination, and hence, as it did not come within any exception provided in such cases, the answer of the witness was final. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 449; People v. Tiley, 84 Cal. 651, 24 Pac.

290; People v. Bell, 53 Cal. 119. There was no error in the rulings of the court excluding the proffered testimony.

The findings are sufficient to uphold the judgment. The other errors assigned are unimportant. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

CONROY v. DUNLAP. (No. 18,282.)

INSOLVENCY — SET-OFF BY DEBTOR OF INSOLVENT —WHEN ALLOWED.

Under the insolvency act of 1880 (section 43), which provides that no set-off shall be allowed, in favor of a debtor of an insolvent, on account of a claim against the insolvent transferred to the debtor "after the filing of the petition," a debtor may set off a claim purchased before the filing of the petition by the insolvent, though he knew of the latter's insolvency.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; Matt. F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by W. C. Conroy, as assignee in insolvency of O. W. Hollenbeck, against William Dunlap. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. P. Tuttle and John M. Fulweiler, for appellant. Ben P. Tabor, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. O. W. Hollenbeck was engaged in the business of banking in Placer county, and on October 31, 1892, the doors of his banking house were closed, and payments suspended, he being insolvent. At that time the defendant was indebted to him in the sum of $321.80 for money loaned, and he was indebted to one Mrs. S. J. Dunlap in the sum of $339.98 for money deposited in his bank by her. On November 1, 1892, Mrs. Dunlap, for a valuable consideration, assigned and transferred in writing her said demand against Hollenbeck to the defendant. On November 10, 1892, Hollenbeck filed in the superior court of Placer county his petition and schedule in voluntary insolvency, and was thereupon adjudged to be an insolvent debtor. Thereafter the plaintiff was duly elected and appointed assignee of the estate of the insolvent, and qualified as such, and the clerk of the court, by an instrument under his hand and the seal of the court, assigned and conveyed to him all the property, real and personal, of the debtor. The plaintiff, as such assignee, brought this action to recover from the defendant the said sum of $321.80, alleging that on the 10th day of November, 1892, the defendant was indebted to Hollenbeck in that sum for money loaned, and that no part of the same had been paid. The defendant, by his answer, denied that he was indebted to Hollenbeck on the 10th day of November, 1892, or at any time after the 1st day of that month, in the sum named, or in any sum; denied that he had not paid his said indebtedness; and averred that on November 1, 1892, he was indebted to Hollenbeck, and Hollenbeck was indebted to Mrs. Dunlap, and Mrs. Dunlap assigned and transferred her said demand to him, as before stated, and that thereby he became, and now is, a creditor of Hollenbeck and of his estate for the balance of said sum, to wit, $18.18.

The case was tried, and the court found the facts to be substantially as above stated, and as conclusions of law: "(1) That the defendant is not entitled to the set-off claimed, and that the same should be disallowed." (2) That the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the sum of $321.80, gold coin of the United States, and to legal interest thereon from the 10th day of November, 1892, and to costs of suit." Judgment was accordingly so entered, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The appellant contends that the conclusions of law were not justified by the facts, and were erroneous; and whether this be so or not must be determined from a consideration of the provisions of the insolvent act of 1880. Section 21 of that act provides that the assignee may sue in his own name to recover any debt due the insolvent, "and no set-off or counter-claim shall be allowed in any such suit, for any debt, unless it was owing to such creditor by such debtor at the time of the adjudication of insolvency." And section 43 provides: "In all cases of mutual debts and mutual credits between the parties the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed and paid. But no set-off or counter-claim shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate; provided, that no set-off or counter-claim shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the insolvent of a claim purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition by or against him, for the purpose of making such set-off or counter-claim." It is evident that the claim here sought to be set off is such a one as may constitute a counter-claim under section 438, Code Civ. Proc., and that it was purchased by and transferred to the defendant before the filing of Hollenbeck's petition in insolvency, and was a debt owing to defendant by Hollenbeck at the time of the adjudication in insolvency. And it is claimed for appellant that, under the maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," section 43, supra, should be so construed as to allow claims purchased before the filing of the petition by the insolvent to be offset, since claims purchased after that date are, in express terms, excluded. There have been no decisions of this court, so far as we are advised, bearing upon the question in hand, but the same question has several times arisen and been passed upon by the federal courts in cases involving the construction of section 20 of the bankrupt act of 1867, which reads as follows: "In all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid, but no set-off shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate; provided, that no set-off shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the bankrupt of a claim purchased or transferred to him after the filing of the petition." The cases referred to are: In re City Bank of Savings, Loan & Discount, Fed. Cas. No. 2,742; Hitchcock v. Rollo, Fed. Cas. No. 6,535; Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610; Hovey v. Insurance Co., Fed. Cas. No. 6,743; Lloyd v. Turner, 5 Sawy. 453, Fed. Cas. No. 8,436.

The case of In re City Bank of Savings, Loan & Discount was the first in point of time, and was decided by the United States district court of California, Hoffman, J. In that case it was held that under the twentieth section of the bankrupt act such a set-off as is here claimed might be made, and the court, after reviewing the English cases bearing on the question, said: "The rule established by these cases seems to have been adopted by congress in framing the provisions of the bankrupt act with regard to offsets. A debtor of the bankrupt is allowed to set off a debt due to him from the bankrupt, provided it has been purchased by or transferred to him before the filing of the petition." Hitchcock v. Rollo was next decided by the United States district court of Illinois, Drummond, J. In that case it was held that a claim against an insolvent, purchased by his debtor before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, with knowledge of the insolvency, could not be used as a set-off, but it was admitted that it might be so used if purchased without such knowledge. And the court, speaking of the case of In re City Bank of Savings, Loan & Discount, said: "It was held in that case that the fact that the creditor of the bankrupt, at the time he assigned his claim to a debtor, had reason to believe the bankrupt to be insolvent, did not prevent the debtor from setting off against the debt the claim thus assigned. * * * If the case decided in California intended to sanction a set-off such as is claimed here, we do not feel inclined to adopt the rule there stated. We hold it to be the duty of a court of equity so to construe the twentieth section as not to suffer it to defeat the main purpose of the bankrupt law, or to permit one creditor in this way to obtain the payment of his claim in full, to the sacrifice of the claims of other creditors." Sawyer v. Hoag was an action brought by the assignee of a bankrupt corporation to recover money alleged to be due the company, and in which the defendant sought to have certain claims against the company, which he had purchased before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, set off against his indebtedness. The court, by Mr. Justice Miller, said: "The first and most important question to be decided in this case is whether the indebtedness of the appellant to the insurance company is to be treated, for the purposes of this suit, as really based on a loan of money by the company to him, or as representing his unpaid stock subscription." And it was held that the money due was for unpaid shares of stock in the company. The court further said: "Though it be a doctrine of modern date, we think it now well established that the capital stock of a corporation, especially its unpaid subscriptions, is a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors of the corporation." And again: "The debt which the appellant owed for his stock was a trust fund, devoted to the payment of all the creditors of the company. As soon as the company became insolvent, and this fact became known to the appellant, the right of set-off for an ordinary debt ceased. It became a fund belonging equally in equity to all the creditors, and could not be appropriated by the debtor to the exclusive payment of his own claim." And upon this ground it was held that the defendant was not entitled to the set-off. Hovey v. Insurance Co. was a case in the United States circuit court of Ohio, in which Swing, J., delivered the opinion. It was held that "a debt of one insolvent purchased by his debtor immediately prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, and purchased in order to set the same off against his indebtedness, is protected by the bankrupt act, it only forbidding the set-off of claims purchased after petition filed." The court reviewed very fully the authorities, and, speaking of Sawyer v. Hoag, said: "If the supreme court had given to the twentieth section the construction contended for, there would have been no necessity of determining the character of the indebtedness of Sawyer, for it was an admitted fact that he knew of the insolvency of the company when he purchased the certificate." And again: "Having determined this most important question, that the debt was a part of the stock of the company, and therefore a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors of the corporation, they decide, as against such a fund, the set-off could not be allowed, and their construction of the twentieth section must be taken as applying to a case of the character they found the one before them to be. So that, rather than being an authority in favor of the construction claimed by plaintiff, it would seem to be one strongly—inferentially, at least—against it." After the foregoing decisions were made, congress, on June 22, 1874, amended section 20 of the bankrupt act by adding at the end thereof the following words: "Or in cases of compulsory bankruptcy, after the act of bankruptcy, upon or in respect of which the adjudication shall be made, with a view of making such set-off." Lloyd v. Turner was a case in the United States district court of California, and was decided in 1879 by Hoffman, J. It was held that "a claim against the bankrupt, purchased before the filing of the petition, but with full knowledge of the insolvency, and with intent to use the claim as a set-off, is available for that purpose to the purchaser in a case of voluntary bankruptcy." The learned judge reviewed the earlier cases, and considered that the conclusion reached derived much support from the case of Sawyer v. Hoag, and also from the amendment made by congress to section 20 in 1874. He said: "That amendment provides that in cases of compulsory bankruptcy no offset shall be allowed of a claim purchased or transferred after the act of bankruptcy in respect of which the adjudication shall be made, and with a view of making such set-off. In voluntary cases the original language of the act has been suffered to stand, and the set-off is prohibited only when purchased or transferred after the filing of the petition."

It is not made clear by the record in this case that either the defendant or Mrs. Dunlap had knowledge of the insolvency of Hollenbeck at the time of the assignment and transfer in question. But, assuming that they did have such knowledge, still, in our opinion, the set-off claimed was authorized by the provisions of the insolvent act, when properly construed, and should have been allowed by the court below. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of the defendant.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of the defendant.

DAUGHERTY v. DAUGHERTY et al. (No. 18,294.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence showed that a conveyance was voluntary, and was made when the grantor was in debt, and embraced all his property subject to execution, that it was kept secret, and the grantor retained possession until his death, and there was uncontradicted evidence of an admission by the grantor that he had conveyed to defraud creditors, a finding that there was no fraud is erroneous.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Amador county; C. V. Gottschalk, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Daugherty, administratrix of the estate of George W. Daugherty, deceased, against Mary Daugherty and Cephas Daugherty, to set aside a conveyance by the deceased to the defendant, Mary Daugherty, and to compel a reconveyance to plaintiff. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. C. Rust and Wm. J. McGee, for appellant. D. B. Spagnoli (Armstrong & Bruner, of counsel), for respondents.

SEARLS, C. George W. Daugherty, a married man, was the owner of a residence and a tract of land known as "Lots Numbers 11, 12, and 13, in Block Number 8," in the town of Jackson, county of Amador, state of California, and was indebted in sundry sums of money, amounting to say $400, of which sums $205 was secured by a mortgage on the lots last mentioned. On or about May 12, 1890, said George W. Daugherty filed a declaration of homestead upon his residence property, and conveyed to his mother, Mary Daugherty, one of the respondents herein, by a voluntary deed of conveyance, in consideration of love and affection, the lots above mentioned. Besides the homestead and the lots thus conveyed, said Daugherty, grantor, had no other property. Mary Daugherty, the mother and respondent, either paid off the mortgage on the lots conveyed to her, or advanced to her son and grantor the money necessary therefor, viz. $210, and the mortgage was satisfied. George W. Daugherty continued in possession of the property so conveyed, and collected to his own use the rents therefrom, amounting to $12 per month, until his death, which occurred April 5, 1891. The appellant herein, who is his widow, was duly appointed administratrix of his estate, qualified as such, procured the homestead to be set apart for her and her infant child, and allowed claims against the estate aggregating some $206, of which claims $100 at least was due prior to the voluntary conveyance aforesaid; and, there being no assets for the payment of said claims, the appellant, at the request of creditors, under section 1589, Code Civ. Proc., instituted this action to set aside, as fraudulent and void, the deed of conveyance, and to compel a reconveyance of the property by the mother, Mary Daugherty, etc. The complaint charges (1) that the conveyance was voluntary, and without valuable consideration; (2) actual fraud on the part of deceased and his mother, with a view to defraud the creditors of deceased. The answer admitted the conveyance, denied all fraud, etc. Cephas Daugherty is the husband of the other defendant, and is made a party defendant. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and written findings filed, negativing all charges of fraud, upon which judgment was entered in favor of defendants for costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

Under section 3442 of our Civil Code, the question of fraudulent intent here is one of fact, and not of law, "nor can any transfer or charge be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration." McFadden v. Mitchell, 54 Cal. 628; Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873; Threlkel v. Scott, 89 Cal. 351, 26 Pac. 879; Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. 557. The question then is, did the testimony warrant the findings of the court? I am driven to the conclusion that it did not. It established, without any conflict whatever, the following facts: (1) That the conveyance was voluntary. (2) That, at the date of the conveyance, decedent was indebted. (3) That he conveyed all of his property subject to execution. (4) That the conveyance was kept secret, and that neither his creditors or his father, who is a defendant here, knew of it until his death. (5) That he continued to use the property as his own up to the time of his death. (6) That one of his creditors, who held a small claim against him, was crowding him for payment. (7) There is also the testimony of four witnesses to the effect that deceased declared to them at different times and places, in substance, "that he owed some money below, and was afraid his creditors would hop on him," and was going to deed the property to his mother, and that his creditors were pushing him, and he expected to be attached, and that "he had deeded his property to prevent his creditors from attaching it, * * * and that he would fight them to the bitter end." There was no contradiction of any of this testimony, except by showing declarations of deceased to the effect that he had had trouble with his wife, had separated from her, and wanted to fix it so that she would not get the property. This constitutes a synopsis of the testimony on the question of fraudulent intent, and upon it the finding should have been in favor of the plaintiff, and the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

WALKERLY et al. v. GREENE, Judge. (No. 15,712.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1894.)

Bill of Exceptions — Grounds for Striking Out — Settlement — Mandamus to Judge — Findings as to Will—Intention of Testator.

1. A bill of exceptions should not be struck out for omitting to set out the evidence or other matter necessary to explain it, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 648, unless it appears that the omission was made with intent to perpetrate a gross and deliberate fraud.

2. A petition for mandamus to compel a judge to settle a bill of exceptions which he has ordered stricken out for fraudulent omission of material facts should allege in substance that such bill contained everything that the petitioner believed it should contain.

3. Where a will is set out in the findings, a bill of exceptions attacking further findings as to what testator "intended" and "meant" cannot be objected to on the ground that the evidence upon which the findings were based was not set out in the bill, since the will is the best evidence of testator's intention.

In bank.

Application for mandamus by John Walkerly and others, legatees of William Walkerly, deceased, against W. E. Greene, judge of the superior court, to compel a settlement of a bill of exceptions on an appeal from a decree of distribution. Writ granted.

B. B. Newman, for petitioners. H. C. Firebaugh, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an original proceeding by mandamus to compel settlement of a bill of exceptions. Petitioners are some of the residuary legatees of William Walkerly, deceased, whose will was admitted to probate in Alameda county in 1887. In 1892 his executors filed their final account, and a petition for distribution of the estate. In August of that year the final account was settled, but the matter of distribution was continued from time to time until November 27, 1893, at which date a decree of distribution was entered, which also embraced the settlement of several accounts filed by the executors supplemental to their final account. On November 28th—the day following the entry of this decree—the petitioners appealed therefrom to this court, and in due time perfected their appeal. By stipulation of parties their time to prepare a bill of exceptions to the decree was extended beyond the 16th of December, and on that day they served on all the other interested parties copies of a document entitled in the cause, and bearing the following caption: "Bill of Exceptions. On appeal from the decree settling the (so-called) final account of the executors and distribution of the estate, made, signed, and filed in the above-entitled action, matter, and proceeding in said superior court on November 27, 1893, and which was appealed from to the supreme court on the 28th day of November, 1893, by the contestants, Mary S. Doughty and ten other nieces and nephews of William Walkerly, deceased, and beneficiaries under his last will." To this proposed bill of exceptions the attorney for the executors proposed amendments, but at the same time he took and reserved the objection that it was not entitled to settlement, because it was a sham and a fraud, purposely omitting nearly everything that it ought to contain, and false in the matters set forth. The attorney for the other interested parties, without offering any amendments to the proposed bill, contented himself with giving notice of a motion to strike it out upon similar grounds, viz. that it was false and insufficient, and not proposed in good faith. Upon this motion and these objections the proposed bill, the amendments, and the notice of the petitioners that they refused to accept said amendments were submitted to the respondent, one of the judges of the superior court of Alameda county, who, on March 26, 1894, sustained the motion to strike out, and dismissed the application of the petitioners for a settlement of the bill, whereupon they filed their petition here for a writ of mandate.

Upon the filing of this petition an alternative writ was directed to the respondent, the judge of said court, who on the return day showed cause by answer and demurrer, in which the executors and some of the legatees unnecessarily joined. The demurrer to the petition is general and special, for want of facts and for uncertainty, and the principal point urged in support of these objections is that it nowhere appears in the petition that the petitioners ever presented to the respondent a fair or proper draft of a bill such as the statute requires them to prepare. This objection is certainly well founded. The petition, though inordinately long, is mainly composed of matters wholly irrelevant, and contains no allegation in form or substance that the draft of the bill proposed by the petitioners (which, it was alleged, embraced numerous exceptions to the findings of fact upon which the decree was based) stated fairly, or at all, the evidence necessary to explain the objections to such findings. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 648) plainly requires that the bill, when it sets forth exceptions to a verdict or other decision upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, must state the objection, with so much of the evidence or other matter as is necessary to explain it, and no more, but of course this ideal bill of exceptions, if it ever should be realized in practice, would probably owe its perfection to the united efforts of the parties and the court through the means provided by law for amending and correcting the statement first proposed, and these provisions would be superfluous if we were to hold that a party is not entitled to a settlement of his bill unless he puts into it everything it should contain, and nothing else, in the first instance. If a review of the decisions of the superior court could be had only upon such conditions, this court would seldom have occasion to consider the merits of litigated controversies, but would undoubtedly find abundant occupation in trying questions similar to these here involved. The statute, however, does not mean that the party desiring a bill of exceptions must propose a perfect bill in the first draft, or forfeit his right to a review of the decision from which he has appealed. The provisions of section 648, Code Civ. Proc., are mainly intended as a guide to the judge in settling the bill, though they also impose a duty upon the parties. It is undoubtedly the duty of the moving party to proceed in good faith, and to do his proper share of the work involved in the settlement of the bill. He has no right to put off upon the opposite party or the judge the labor of reducing to writing, and incorporating by way of amendment, statements of evidence and other matters which he knows a proper and fair bill of exceptions ought to contain. Nor has he any right to include statements or matters that are untrue or irrelevant. A corresponding duty rests upon the opposite party, who has no right to propose amendments which he knows ought not to be allowed. But although these reciprocal duties of the parties are undoubted, it is not easy to decide in a particular case whether or not they have been consciously and deliberately violated; and it is only in a gross case of palpable and deliberate fraud that the severe penalty of striking out the bill, and thus denying the party a hearing upon the merits of his case, can be properly imposed. In Hearst v. Dennison, 72 Cal. 228, 13 Pac. 628, we held that the judge of the superior court was justified in refusing to settle a bill of exceptions when the draft of the proposed bill was a mere "pretense and fraud," when it was "so grossly untrue, or so foreign to the real history of the case, as to come within no reasonable meaning of 'a statement of the case,' as used in the Code." In Sansome v. Myers, 77 Cal. 356, 19 Pac. 577, this doctrine was perhaps carried even further with respect to a bill of exceptions in a criminal case. But that decision, which was made in overruling a demurrer to the answer of the respondent, was somewhat modified by the subsequent decision of the same cause upon the facts reported by the referee who tried the issues. See 80 Cal. 483, 22 Pac. 212. In effect, the right of a judge to strike out or refuse to settle a bill of exceptions was limited to a case of gross and manifest fraud on the part of the one proposing it. Such a case will not often present itself, but cases do arise every day in which there is not only a disagreement of the parties with each other, but an equally radical disagreement between the court and the parties as to what the statement of the case ought to contain. As to what it ought not to contain this court has painful experience of the fact that even settled bills of exceptions are frequently overladen with statements and repetitions of evidence and other matters which serve no purpose except to multiply costs and render more difficult the examination of the vital points of the controversy.

From this general statement of our views, it follows that we cannot hold that a petition for a writ of mandate in a case of this character is fatally defective when it fails to show that the proposed bill of exceptions was absolutely such as a settled statement ought to be, but we do think the petition ought to allege in substance that the proposed bill contained everything that the petitioner honestly believed it should contain. And if the defects of this petition had not escaped our attention at the time, we should not have issued the alternative writ; but, having issued it, and the respondent having, by his answer, presented with great fulness all the facts and grounds upon which his refusal to settle the bill was based, we do not deem it necessary or proper now to sustain the demurrer and quash the writ merely in order, by the filing of an amended petition and the issuance of a new writ, to get finally to an issue which is as completely joined as it ever could be joined in the most orderly procedure. On the contrary, we think that under the circumstances the proper course to pursue is to treat the answer as a waiver of the demurrer; and this brings us to the question whether there is any material issue made by the pleadings, or, in other words, whether the matters set out in the answer do not cure the defect in the petition. The petition is, as we have said, inordinately long, and the answer is correspondingly voluminous, made so by the careful denial of most of the immaterial allegations of the petition. It also has attached as exhibits copies of the proposed bill of exceptions of the amendments proposed by the executors, of the motion of certain legatees to strike out the proposed bill, and of the order of the respondent sustaining said motion. In response to this answer the petitioners file another formidable document in the nature of a replication, closing with a prayer that the matter may be referred to a commissioner to take and report evidence as to the material issues, etc., and that upon the coming in of his report this motion be set down upon the calendar of the court for hearing and further argument, etc., etc. This prayer suggests a long series of proceedings upon which we should enter with extreme reluctance, even if it were strictly necessary. But we do not deem it necessary. It appears to us that there is a much shorter road to the end of a controversy which, on the line suggested, might, and probably would, protract itself indefinitely, to the detriment of all parties interested in the Walkerly estate, not to mention the business of the court and the interests of other suitors.

Taking the admitted allegations of the petition and the allegations of the answer which support the petition, we think facts enough appear to justify us in holding that the refusal of the respondent to settle this bill of exceptions is not justified. The bill, as prepared, is certainly not a model, and we can well conceive that the task of settling it is one which would severely tax the patience of a busy officer; but we do not think it bears evidence of bad faith and purposed unfairness. Its faults appear, on the contrary, to be due to deficient knowledge of the true office and essential nature of a bill of exceptions, which exhibits itself much more conspicuously in the useless and redundant matter incorporated in the draft than in the comparatively slight omissions of evidence that ought to have been set out. The decree appealed from was a decree of distribution and settlement of accounts supplemental to the final account of the executors. Besides the recitals of fact contained in the decree proper, it referred to, and was partly based upon, certain "findings of fact," which were filed with the decree. The petitioners objected to a number of these findings upon the ground that they were not sustained by the evidence, but when we come to look at the findings so objected to we find that they were not in reality, except in two or three instances, findings of fact, but rather conclusions of fact from other facts specifically found, or conclusions of law. As to these objections, no evidence was needed, or could be admitted, to explain them; and as to the two or three findings strictly of fact, which were questioned, the evidence to support them, if it existed, could have been supplied by a very short amendment, which could have been written out and inserted in far less time than it must have taken to prepare the order striking out the proposed bill. To be more specific upon this point, we will state that the will and codicil of William Walkerly, as admitted to probate in 1887, are found and recited in full in the findings and decree. It is then found by a number of successive findings that the testator "intended" and "meant" a variety of things, and it is these findings as to the intention and meaning of the testator which are the principal object of attack in the bill of exceptions as proposed. The respondent says in his answer that the evidence upon which these findings are based was not set out in the proposed bill. But what evidence could there have been of what the testator meant and intended except the terms of the will and codicil? Of course there may have been some questions as to identity of the property disposed of, or the number or identity of legatees, or other latent ambiguities in the will as to which extraneous evidence was admissible, and possibly there may have been something in the circumstances surrounding the testator at the time the will was made of which evidence was admissible for the purpose of construction; but the findings of intention which the petitioners have attacked have no possible dependence upon extraneous evidence. They depend wholly upon the terms of the will, and the recitals it contains, and the exceptions to them are in fact nothing but arguments founded upon the terms of the will.

In the careful examination of the proposed bill which we have made we find but three questions raised as to real findings of fact: (1) As to the character and value of the services of the attorney for certain legatees; (2) as to the character and value of the services of the attorney for the executors; (3) as to the extraordinary services of the executors. As to these findings it is claimed by petitioners in their proposed bill that the evidence did not sustain them, and it sets out no evidence on the subject. The respondent says that the evidence amply sustained these findings, and that it was purposely and fraudulently omitted. Possibly it may have been, but from all the facts disclosed we are disposed to take a more charitable view of the matter, and to hold that this omission ought not to deprive the petitioners of a hearing upon the more important questions involved in the appeal. The amount of these items is comparatively trifling, and the amendments proposed by the executors will supply the evidence with no trouble to anyone except the petitioners when they come to engross the bill.

The other specifications, with a single exception, are of errors of law in the conclusions of the court, and neither need nor admit of explanation by evidence. The exception referred to relates to the ruling of the court denying a continuance. The statement of this matter is said to be false. If so, an allowance of the proposed amendment, which is very brief, would have cured it. Upon the whole, we think the bill should have been settled. The objection that it was out of time, because the parties had only stipulated an extension of time to prepare a bill of exceptions, and not a statement of the case, is untenable. Equally untenable is the objection to the name or description which the petitioners gave to the bill. We have quoted its caption in the beginning of this opinion, and we think it is entirely sufficient to show what the paper was, and to connect it with the notice of appeal. Let a peremptory writ issue.

In re WALKERLY'S ESTATE. (No. 15,794.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1894.)

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—GROUNDS.

1. An appeal will not be dismissed because of the failure to file a printed transcript of the record in time, where an application is pending to settle the bill of exceptions.

2. As no appeal is instituted by the service of a notice of appeal after the time to appeal has expired, an order will not be made dismissing such an attempted appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Accounting by the executors of the will of William Walkerly. Motion to dismiss two appeals. Motion denied.

B. B. Newman, for appellant. Rogers & Paterson, for the widow. H. C. Firebaugh, for respondent. F. G. Whitney, for certain beneficiaries.

BEATTY, C. J. These are motions to dismiss two appeals,—one from a decree or order settling the accounts of the executors supplemental to their final account and distributing the estate, which was made and entered November 27, 1893; the other an attempted appeal from an order settling the final account of the executors, which was made and entered in August, 1892. The motion to dismiss the first-mentioned appeal is based upon the alleged failure of the appellants to file a printed transcript of the record in time, and is overruled because it appears that an application to settle a bill of exceptions to the said order is pending. See Walkerly v. Greene (No. 15,712, just decided) 37 Pac. 890. The other motion to dismiss is also overruled, but solely on the ground that there is no such appeal; the notice having been given long after the time to appeal had expired.

MERRITT et al. v. HILL et al. (No. 18,120.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1894.)

TRESPASS BY CATTLE—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

A complaint in an action for trespass in Trinity county, alleging that "defendant's cattle and horses ran and trespassed upon said land," and destroyed the grass growing thereon, does not state a cause of action, it not alleging that the trespass was instigated by defendant, nor that defendant had notice thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; T. E. Jones, Judge.

Action of trespass by Merritt and Gwinn against Hill and Lauffer. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal.

McKune & George, for appellants. Coonan & Sevier, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. The substance of the complaint in this action is that, while plaintiffs were owners and in possession of about eight sections of land in Trinity county (not alleged to have been inclosed), "defendants' cattle and horses ran and trespassed upon said lands, ate up, injured, and destroyed the grass, hay, and verdure being and growing thereon," to the damage of plaintiffs in the sum of $1,000. It is not alleged that the trespass was instigated by defendants, nor that defendants had notice thereof. A demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it does not state a cause of action was sustained by the court, and, plaintiffs having declined to amend their complaint, judgment passed for the defendants. Plaintiffs bring this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, and contend that "at common law the rule was that every man must, at his peril, keep his cattle on his own land; and if he fails he is liable for their trespass on the land of others, whether fenced or unfenced;" citing 3 Bl. Comm. 211; Cooley, Torts, 337; Pol. Code, § 4468.

In 1850 the legislature of this state enacted that "the common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, or the constitution or laws of the state of California, shall be the rule of decision in all courts of this state;" and section 4468 of the Political Code is to the same effect. Yet it has been held in several cases that the common-law rule as to trespassing animals, claimed by appellants to be applicable to this case, is inconsistent with certain general legislative acts which have always been in force in this state, except as repealed by local laws applicable to some particular counties, of which Trinity is admitted not to be one; and therefore that the common-law rule invoked by appellants has never been in force in this state. Waters v. Moss, 12 Cal. 538; Comerford v. Dupuy, 17 Cal. 308; Logan v. Gedney, 38 Cal. 581. And the authority of these cases was recognized in Hahn v. Garratt, 69 Cal. 147, 10 Pac. 329, the decision of which, however, was governed by a local law, applicable to Santa Clara county alone. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HOPPE et al. v. HOPPE et al. (No. 18,225.)

FOUNTAIN v. HOPPE (HOPPE et al., Interveners).

HOMESTEAD—SURVIVING WIFE—POWER TO MORTGAGE—RIGHTS OF MINOR CHILDREN—MORTGAGE BY COTENANT—FORECLOSURE—PARTIES.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, provides that the homestead set apart after the death of one of the parents is "for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor chidlren." Held that, where the order of the court set the homestead apart to the wife for the "use of the family," she could not destroy its quality as a homestead until the children arrived at majority.

2. An action for the partition of a homestead set apart for the "use of the surviving wife and minor children" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1465) will not lie until the children have reached their majority.

3. One cotenant cannot intervene in an action to foreclose a mortgage on his cotenant's interest.

4. Though a surviving wife may mortgage her interest in the homestead, a purchaser at the foreclosure sale has no right to the possession of any part of the homestead during the minority of any of the children.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Actions by Herman W. Hoppe and others against Julia Hoppe and W. A. Fountain, and by W. A. Fountain against Julia Hoppe, in which Herman Hoppe and others intervened. The actions were consolidated, and from the judgment Herman Hoppe and others and Julia Hoppe appeal. Reversed.

Armstrong & Platnauer and Henry C. Ross, Jr., for appellants. Clinton L. White, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The first of these actions (Herman W. Hoppe et al. v. Julia Hoppe and W. A. Fountain) was to obtain a partition of the lands described in the complaint between the plaintiffs and Julia Hoppe, Fountain being a party defendant because he claimed to be a mortgagee of the whole of the premises under a mortgage executed by the defendant Julia Hoppe. The second of these actions was afterwards brought by Fountain against Julia Hoppe to foreclose said mortgage, and the plaintiffs in the first action intervened in the second, and by order of the court the two actions were consolidated. Fountain demurred to the complaint in partition, and also to the complaint in intervention, and to the answer of Julia Hoppe in the foreclosure case; and these demurrers were each sustained, and judgment dismissing the action for partition and the complaint in intervention, and foreclosing the mortgage, was entered. The interveners and Julia Hoppe separately appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions setting out the order consolidating the actions, and excepting to the rulings upon demurrer. The facts set out in the several pleadings demurred to are substantially the same, and show the following facts: F. W. Hoppe died August 10, 1881, leaving the appellant Julia, his widow, and nine children, of whom these interveners were minors, the others being of full age. At the time of his death he was possessed of a tract of land upon which he and his family resided, containing about 160 acres, situated in Sacramento county, the same being community property. The widow was appointed administratrix, and on October 1, 1881, filed an inventory and appraisement of the estate, wherein said land was appraised at $4,000. She also filed a petition praying for an order setting aside said land, with the dwelling house thereon, "for the use of the family of deceased," and alleged that the family consisted of herself and nine children, all of whom were named therein; but their ages were not given, nor was it alleged that any of them were minors. Upon this petition, on the 7th day of October, 1881, the court made an order, of which the following is a copy: "In the Matter of the Estate of F. W. Hoppe, Deceased. Julia Hoppe, the administratix of the estate of F. W. Hoppe, deceased, having on the 21st day of September, 1881, made application to the court by petition for an order setting apart, for the use and benefit of the family of said deceased, the real estate mentioned in said petition, together with the improvements thereon, as a homestead. And it duly appearing, to the satisfaction of the court, from the papers on file in the matter of said estate, and other evidence, that said deceased was a resident of Sacramento county at his death, and left estate therein; that letters of administration were duly issued to said Julia Hoppe on the 5th day of September, 1881, and said administratrix duly returned an inventory and appraisement of said estate; that the family of said deceased consist of said Julia Hoppe, his widow, and Emma, Frank, Edward, Othelie, Clara, Robert, Herman, Louis, and Lena Hoppe, his children, and that said applicant, Julia Hoppe, is entitled to have the said premises set apart to her for a homestead; and that the same does not exceed in value five thousand dollars,—it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that all that certain piece or quantity of land lying and being in the county of Sacramento and state of California, and particularly described as follows, * * * be and the same is hereby set apart to the widow of said F. W. Hoppe, deceased, as a homestead, and shall not be subject to administration." The complaint in intervention further alleged that in the application for letters of administration the names of the interveners were stated, together with their respective ages; that no homestead had been selected, declared, or recorded by F. W. Hoppe and his wife, or either of them, prior to his death; that at the time said homestead was set apart they were minors, the eldest being then 14 years old, and the youngest 5; that the court did not fix a day for the hearing of said petition; that no notice was given in any manner of the hearing; that they had no notice of the hearing; that they had no guardian, general or special; and that they were not represented at the hearing by attorney appointed by the court, or by any person. On December 20, 1888, Julia Hoppe executed a mortgage upon the whole of the homestead to respondent, Fountain, to secure the sum of $5,000, and it was this mortgage which was foreclosed; and, in regard to the mortgage, it was alleged that Fountain took it with full knowledge of all the facts.

1. The decree setting apart the homestead vested the title thereto in the minor children, as well as in the mother. No homestead had been selected, designated, or recorded in the lifetime of the husband; and the application for the homestead, together with the order setting it apart, were made under the provisions of section 1465, Code Civ. Proc. By the terms of that section the homestead thus set apart is "for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children;" and, by the provisions of section 1468, when property is thus set apart to the use of the family "the one-half of such property shall belong to the widow or surviving husband, and the remainder to the child, or in equal shares to the children, if there be more than one." "The term 'family' throughout the chapter, is used as synonymous with and as representing the surviving wife or husband and children, if any." Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 170, 34 Pac. 667. Whether, therefore, the order setting it apart is to be construed in connection with the application, or whether the mother is to be regarded as having taken the title in trust for the minor children, is immaterial. In either case the homestead was set apart "for the use of the family," and "belongs" to the widow and minor children, and is to remain as a homestead, without any power in either of the parties interested to destroy its quality as a homestead, until after all of the children shall have arrived at majority.

2. The court properly sustained the demurrer to the action in partition. The homestead is a place of abode for the family, and no act of any member of the family can in any way prejudice the rights of the others to occupy it. It must remain intact until the youngest child has reached its majority. Hence, it is not competent for either of the other cotenants to have a partition until that period has been reached. Phelan v. Smith, supra; Trotter v. Trotter, 31 Ark. 145; Hoffman v. Neuhaus, 30 Tex. 633; Keyes v. Hill, 30 Vt. 759; Roberts v. Ware, 80 Mo. 363. We do not mean to say that no case can arise where a court would not authorize the partition or sale of a homestead. Circumstances might exist where it would be the duty of the court, for the benefit of the minor, to decree a partition, or order the interest of the minor to be sold. But this qualification need not be discussed.

3. As the owner of an undivided interest in the land, it was competent for the mother to mortgage or convey such interest. She could not, however, confer upon her grantee or mortgagee any greater rights in the premises than she herself held. As she could not destroy the homestead quality of the premises, or deprive the minor children of their right to occupy the homestead, any grantee of her interest must take it subject to the same limitations. A purchaser at the foreclosure sale can obtain no greater rights than would her immediate grantee, and the court in the foreclosure proceedings would have no right, by reason of any covenant in the mortgage or allegation in the complaint, to make any order or direct any act which would affect the rights of any of her cotenants. For the purpose of informing the court of the extent of her interest and the nature of the estate which she had mortgaged, it was proper for her to allege in her answer the manner in which her title had been derived, and to show that the premises had been set apart as a homestead, and that their homestead quality had not yet ceased. Upon these facts being brought to the attention of the court, the decree it might make would be adapted to the rights of the respective parties to the action. As the purchaser under the decree would not have a right of entry upon the premises as a cotenant until the termination of the homestead, that limitation should be included in the decree under which the sale should be made. The demurrer to the separate answer of Mrs. Hoppe should therefore have been overruled.

4. The court properly sustained the demurrer to the complaint in intervention. The title of the interveners was in no respect subject to the mortgage, and the rule is well settled that parties holding such title should not be joined in a suit for the foreclosure of the mortgage. Ord v. Bartlett, 83 Cal. 428, 23 Pac. 705; Cody v. Bean, 93 Cal. 579, 29 Pac. 223. And their presence as interveners is as equally unauthorized as though they had been made defendants. As the mortgage of their cotenant could not impair their rights, there was no occasion for them to intervene to protect their rights. The only object to be accomplished by the foreclosure is to transfer to the purchaser under the decree the same title that was conveyed by the mortgagor, and upon receiving the sheriff's deed such purchaser will be placed in the same attitude to the other cotenants as was the mortgagor. In the foreclosure of a mortgage made by one cotenant of his interest in lands, the court will not, while the proceedings are pending or after judgment, interfere with the rights of the other cotenants, or attempt to disturb their possession; and any allegations in the complaint of a covenant in such mortgage for the appointment of a receiver, or any prayer in the complaint for a receiver, will be disregarded by the court, for the reason that it is not competent for one cotenant, either directly or through the aid of the court, to do any act which will impair the rights of his fellow cotenants. The judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to overrule the demurrer of the respondent to the answer of the defendant.

CRADDOCK v. O'BRIEN. (No. 18,276.)

COMPENSATION OF ATTORNEY — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT — COLLECTION OF CLAIMS UNDER DRAINAGE ACT—ABANDONMENT OF EMPLOYMENT.

1. Defendant employed plaintiff to collect certain judgments against a drainage district for land taken and material furnished, plaintiff to receive a certain amount if successful. At the time the judgments had been declared void, the act organizing the drainage district being unconstitutional, the legislature passed an act providing for the payment of claims arising under the drainage act. The board of examiners, acting under the latter act, on the presentation of defendant's claim by another attorney, employed without plaintiff's consent, allowed the claim for the same amount as the judgments, though they, being void, were not admitted as evidence of the claim. Held, that the "judgments" and the claim allowed were in effect the same, and plaintiff was entitled to the agreed fee.

2. Where a person, after having employed one attorney to collect a claim, without the latter's knowledge employs another to collect it, the burden of proof is on him to show that the first attorney had either expressly or by lack of effort abandoned its collection.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; Phil. W. Keyser, Judge.

Action by J. H. Craddock against James O'Brien. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. G. Murphy, for appellant. J. H. Craddock and W. H. Carlin, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The defendant, in 1885, was the owner of certain judgments rendered by the superior court of Yuba county against "Drainage District Number One of the State of California" (which was organized under the act of April 23, 1880, entitled "An act to promote drainage"), and made an agreement with the plaintiff, Craddock, whereby plaintiff undertook to collect them, and for which service, if successful, defendant agreed he should receive $1,000. This agreement, however, included another judgment in which defendant was not interested. Plaintiff also received for collection other claims of like character, all being judgments against said "drainage district" rendered in "condemnation proceedings" instituted by said district under the Code provisions entitled "Of Eminent Domain;" but in the case of People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 625, it had been held that the act under which the district was organized was unconstitutional, and that the district had no legal existence. The work, however, which the district was organized to accomplish appears to have been done, so far as it affected the property of O'Brien and the others in whose favor judgments had been rendered, and the legislature, realizing that these parties should be compensated, in 1885 passed an act making an appropriation for the payment of claims which had arisen under the first act, and which, it was supposed, would authorize the payment of these judgments. Plaintiff thereupon commenced a proceeding in mandamus against the state comptroller upon one of the claims in his hands, to test the right of these claimants under the act of 1885, and that case (Callahan v. Dunn) was appealed to this court by the comptroller, and is reported in 78 Cal. 366, 20 Pac. 737, where it was held that the plaintiff was not within the third section of the act of 1885, as presented by his complaint, the cause having gone off in the court below upon demurrer to the complaint. Having failed in this proceeding, the plaintiff continued his efforts to secure the payment of these claims, principally by conferences with the attorney general with a view to arriving at an understanding as to the mode or form of presenting them which would satisfy the law officer of the state. The case of Callahan v. Dunn was decided in this court March 12, 1889. The attorney general was absent much of the time thereafter on business, and upon his return in November of that year a proposition to resubmit all the claims represented by plaintiff to the board of examiners, as suggested by plaintiff, was agreed upon. In the meantime defendant, O'Brien, employed one Maslin to collect his claims, such employment being without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, and payment of one of his claims was procured on October 3, 1889, and of the other on January 27, 1890. This case was tried before the court without a jury, and findings and judgment passed in favor of plaintiff for the proportion of $1,000 which the two claims of O'Brien bore to the three claims included in the agreement; and defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

No question is made on the appeal from the judgment, but it is contended that the findings are not justified by the evidence, the points being stated in appellant's brief as follows: "The main question that presents itself in this case, and upon which appellant mostly relies, is whether the claims presented by Maslin, to pay which the said warrants were drawn, were legally the same claims which respondent had assumed to collect; and whether respondent had exercised due diligence and ability in the collection of the claims intrusted to him for collection by appellant." We think neither of these questions can be answered favorably to appellant. It is true that at the time of respondent's employment these claims existed in the form of judgments, but these judgments were known to be void, having been so declared by the supreme court. All the injury, however, which O'Brien was entitled to compensation for had been inflicted prior to that time; and although the board of examiners, acting under the law of 1885, and following the decision of Callahan v. Dunn, supra, refused to recognize the judgments as evidence of the amount of compensation to which appellant was entitled, or of the injury done, whatever its character, did allow his claims for the same amounts specified in the judgments, and for injuries which were included in the judgments. In Callahan v. Dunn, 78 Cal., at page 368, 20 Pac. 737, a doubt was expressed whether the language of the act of 1885, "for work done and materials furnished," included compensation for land taken; but it was said that, though a judgment was alleged to have been rendered, the money had not been paid, and that consequently the title did not vest in the district. The question whether "land taken" was within the act of 1885 not having been decided by this court, the board of examiners, in the exercise of its judicial powers, was authorized to construe the act for itself, and evidently did so, at least as to the claim known as that of O'Brien and Walters, inasmuch as in the supplemental affidavit of appellant in support of said last-mentioned claim he states that the value of the timber taken was not less than $2,000, and "that the land destroyed and taken by the directors caused a damage to him of not less than $2,000," though the claim he presented was for $2,566.75, which he alleges was the amount agreed upon with the directors, and that the proceedings for condemnation were had at the suggestion of the directors, as their rights would be better secured thereby. These facts, we think, clearly show that the claims represented by these judgments and those audited and allowed by the board of examiners were in all essential particulars the same, and were not other or different claims from those which plaintiff was employed to collect either as to character or amount. That respondent exercised reasonable diligence and ability in the prosecution of these claims will not admit of serious question. The questions presented in Callahan v. Dunn were not so clear as to charge counsel with any lack of ability, while the time that elapsed after that decision before he secured the allowance of the other claims was not such as, under the circumstances, could be charged as a lack of diligence. Besides, appellant employed another to collect the same claims without notice to respondent, and must assume the burden of showing that respondent himself had abandoned the prosecution, either expressly or by such lack of effort as would reasonably show an abandonment. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

BANKS v. YOLO COUNTY. (No. 18,354.)

BOARD OF EDUCATION—COMPENSATION—REPEAL OF ACT.

Pol. Code, § 1770, as amended by Act March 15, 1889, allowing five dollars per day to each member of the board of education for certain services, is not repealed by Act March 16, 1889, amending certain sections of the county government act, the later act not referring to compensation of members of said board.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by George Banks against Yolo county for salary as secretary of the board of education. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Head, for appellant. R. L. Simpson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. We do not think that section 1770 of the Political Code, as amended by an act approved March 15, 1889, which allows five dollars per day to each member of the board of education, including the secretary, for certain services, was repealed by sections 180 and 211 of an act approved the following day, March 16th, amending certain sections of the county government act (St. 1889, pp. 191, 192, 270, 300). There is no clause in the latter act expressly repealing any part of the former act; indeed, it has no repealing clause at all. If, therefore, it repeals the former act, it must do so by implication. But "repeals by implication are not favored, and the repugnancy between two statutes should be very clear to warrant a court holding that the later in time repeals the other, when it does not in terms purport to do so. This rule has peculiar force in the case of laws of special and local application, which are never deemed repealed by general legislation except upon the most unequivocal manifestation of intent to that effect." Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 182. In the case at bar the two acts, passed so near each other in point of time, must be so construed, if possible, as to give effect to both; and we see no irreconcilable conflict. The act of March 15th refers to a special subject,—compensation of members of the board of education,—while said subject is not referred to in the act of March 16th, which is in its nature general. Moreover, the parts of the said act of March 16th, which are invoked as repealing the part of the said act of March 15th here in question, are only re-enactments of the law as it theretofore stood; and some consideration is to be given to the rule declared in section 325 of the Political Code, that: "Where a section or part of a statute is amended, it is not to be considered as having been repealed and re-enacted in the amended form, but the provisions which are not altered are to be considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted, and the new provisions are to be considered as having been enacted at the time of the amendment." See Dillon v. Saloude, 68 Cal. 270, 271, 9 Pac. 162. Respondent's cause of action is not barred by the clauses of the statute of limitations invoked by appellant. It is founded on "a liability created by statute," and comes within the three-years limitation. Code Civ. Proc. § 338; Higby v. Calaveras Co., 18 Cal. 178. There are no other points necessary to be noticed. The judgment is affirmed.

THOMPSON v. GORNER. (No. 15,262.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 24, 1894.)

INTEREST—PROVISION FOR INCREASE AFTER DEFAULT—EFFECT—WAIVER.

1. Where a contract provides for interest at a certain rate, and that on default, in addition thereto, interest shall be paid at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, the acceptance, after default, of interest at the rate of 8 per cent., without demand for the 1 per cent. per month, is not a waiver of the latter interest accruing after the one entitled thereto has given notice that he will insist upon the same. Thompson v. Gorner (Cal.) 36 Pac. 434, reversed.

2. The provision in a promissory note that after default, in addition to the interest provided for, the maker will pay 1 per cent. per month extra, is not a penalty clause, but a contract, but the acceptance, after default, of interest without the extra 1 per cent., is a waiver thereof for the months for which such interest was accepted. Thompson v. Gorner (Cal.) 36 Pac. 434, affirmed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by Mary Thompson against Christ Gorner to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edgar B. Haymond, for appellant. John Yule and Edward H. Stearns, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage given to secure a promissory note. The appeal involves only a small amount of interest on the principal of the note. The note was dated March 20, 1888, and matured two years after date. The interest clause, which gives rise to the present controversy, is as follows: "With interest thereon, in like gold coin, from the date hereof until paid at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable monthly in advance, and, if said principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of one per cent. per month." The monthly interest was paid each month until the maturity of the note. After that—the principal not having been paid—the defendant continued to pay to plaintiff, who was the holder of the note, the monthly interest at 8 per cent. per annum; and said interest at said rate was received by plaintiff, and accepted by her as payment of said monthly interest, until February 20, 1892. On said last-named day defendant offered to pay a month's interest as usual,—at the said rate of 8 per cent. per annum,—but the plaintiff refused to receive it, and claimed interest at 1 per cent. per month as provided in the note. On March 18, 1892, defendant tendered to plaintiff the whole amount of principal due, and also the amount of interest due rated at 8 per cent. per annum. This the plaintiff refused to receive as full payment of the whole indebtedness on the note and mortgage, and on March 31, 1892, she commenced this action. The court below held, as conclusions of law, that the 1 per cent. per month was in the nature of a penalty; and also that plaintiff, having accepted the monthly interest at 8 per cent. per annum for nearly two years, waived any claim of right to exact 1 per cent. per month interest after the maturity of the note. When this appeal was in department it was held that the 1 per cent. clause in the note was not to be treated as a penalty, but as a contract to pay 1 per cent. per month interest upon a contingency shown to have happened, but that the acceptance by plaintiff of the interest at 8 per cent. per annum was a waiver of her claim to collect more interest for the months for which she had so accepted the interest at 8 per cent. We are satisfied with both of these conclusions, and adhere to them. But it was also held in department that plaintiff, by accepting the 8 per cent. for past months, waived her right to demand the 1 per cent. per month in the future. Plaintiff's points and authorities were very meager, covering only one page, and referring only to the question of penalty. In her petition for hearing in bank her counsel calls our attention to section 1698 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise." Under the principle of this section the plaintiff was entitled to recover interest at 1 per cent. per month for the time during which she refused to accept, and did not accept, interest at 8 per cent. per annum. She did not contract in writing to change the interest as expressed by the written terms of the note, and her acceptance of the 8 per cent. was of no higher dignity than an express oral agreement. But it was an executed agreement only as to months for which she accepted the interest at 8 per cent.; as to the future, it was executory (Erenberg v. Peters, 66 Cal. 114, 4 Pac. 1091; Taylor v. Soldati, 68 Cal. 27, 8 Pac. 518; Simmons v. Hamilton, 56 Cal. 493), and void under said section of the Code (Johnson v. Polhemus, 99 Cal. 240, 33 Pac. 908). It does not clearly appear from the transcript, which by stipulation does not include all of the judgment roll, whether or not plaintiff claims as interest the difference between 8 per cent. and the 1 per cent. for the months during which she accepted the 8 per cent., but she is not entitled to said difference for said months. She is entitled, however, to interest at 1 per cent. per month from the time she first demanded it. She should have judgment for the amount of the principal, and interest thereon from and after the 20th day of February, 1892, at 1 per cent. per month. The judgment is reversed, with direction to the superior court to render judgment for the plaintiff for the amount due and unpaid upon the principal of the note, together with interest thereon from February 20, 1892, at 1 per cent. per month.

MACOMBER v. CONRADT et al. (No. 15,259.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1894.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by C. A. Macomber against Julius Conradt and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John H. Durst, for appellants. Henley, Swift & MacSherry and S. V. Castello, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The averments of the complaint show that the contract between respondent and appellants was one for the purchase and sale of mining stocks on margin, and the court found that the said averments were true. The appeal is based on the judgment roll alone, and there is no evidence before us. The judgment must therefore be affirmed on the authority of Cashman v. Root, 89 Cal. 373, 26 Pac. 883, and the recent case of Sheehy v. Shinn (Cal.) 37 Pac. 393. There is no conflict between said cases and Kutz v. Fleischer, 67 Cal. 93, 7 Pac. 195. The judgment is affirmed.

McCREA v. JOHNSON et al. (No. 15,580.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—ASSIGNMENT.

An assignee of a mechanic's or material man's claim cannot file the notice of claim or serve the notice on the owners, so as to perfect the lien, as the privilege of asserting a mechanic's lien cannot be assigned.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. H. Levy, Judge.

Action by G. P. McCrea against Kate Johnson and others to enforce mechanics' liens. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. P. McCrea and J. C. Bates, for appellant. W. H. Mahoney, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. The plaintiff is the assignee of the claims of certain laborers who performed work for a subcontractor in the erection of a certain building belonging to the respondent Kate Johnson. Her codefendants are the original contractors and the subcontractors. After the aforesaid assignment was made, the assignee proceeded under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and served a notice upon said Johnson, stating that he was such assignee, and, among other things, requesting her to withhold from the contractor sufficient funds to meet his demands therein stated. Plaintiff subsequently filed his claim of lien, and brought this action to recover thereon.

Two questions only are involved in this appeal: (1) Has an assignee of the claim of a mechanic or a material man the right to file in the recorder's office the notice of claim of lien provided by the statute? (2) Has such assignee the right to serve upon the owner the notice provided by the terms of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure? We are compelled to answer both interrogatories in the negative. It is squarely decided in Mills v. Land Co., 97 Cal. 254, 32 Pac. 169, that the right to create and assert a mechanic's or laborer's lien, under the mechanic's lien law, is a personal right, and nonassignable. It is sufficient to say that we are entirely satisfied with the principle there declared, and now reaffirm it as the law of this state. A large majority of the cases cited by the appellant as opposed to this view are not in point. They come directly in line with the views of this court as found expressed in the recent case of Duncan v. Hawn (opinion filed September 5, 1894) 37 Pac. 626. We are also satisfied that the principle which points the judgment in the Mills Case, when applied to appellant's right to give the notice to the owner contemplated by section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is fatal to his claims upon this appeal. The right to give this notice, and to secure certain benefits thereby, was a personal right of the laborer, which could not be assigned. It was no more assignable than the right to file a notice of claim of lien was assignable. Plaintiff's assignors transferred to him their claims and demands, and those claims and demands were against the subcontractor alone who employed them. At the date of such assignment, they had no claim or demand against the owner of the building of any kind or character, and, consequently, no legal rights against the owner passed to the plaintiff by the assignment. The effect of the notice provided by the section of the Code, when served by the proper parties and under certain conditions, is to create new rights and new liabilities; and, for the purposes of this case, it is entirely immaterial whether such service results in the creation of a lien upon the fund in the hands of the owner owing to the contractor, or whether a simple legal liability is created in favor of the laborer and against the owner. Under either of these conditions, the assignment of the demand cannot carry with it the right to give a notice which will accomplish such results. If a lien is created by the service of the notice, then the case is squarely within the principle declared in Mills v. Land Co.; and, if the service of the notice simply results in the creation of a legal liability against the owner of the building where none before existed, the same principle is equally applicable, and there can be no assignment of such a right. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

BOUCHE v. LOUTTIT. (No. 18,300.)

RELEASE OF GUARANTOR—FAILURE TO EXHAUST SECURITY.

1. Where defendant, to secure a mortgage note given by another, gave his nonnegotiable note under an agreement that, on the maturity of the mortgage note, the mortgage should be immediately foreclosed, and defendant should be liable only for the deficiency, the latter was released by a delay of four years in foreclosing the mortgage.

2. An action against the guarantor of any deficiency on a note after the security has been exhausted, brought before the security has been sold, is premature.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by Nelson Bouche against James A. Louttit. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Paulsell and Ed. R. Thompson, for appellant. Louttit, Woods & Levinsky, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action is upon a nonnegotiable promissory note, executed June 1, 1881, by defendant, to one H. E. Williamson. Defendant was not indebted to Williamson, but the note was intended as collateral security for the obligation of D. and A. Bolte, who on that day borrowed from Williamson the sum of $1,100. The Bolte note was also secured by a mortgage on land in Calaveras county. The understanding between Louttit and Williamson was that, when the Bolte note became due, Williamson would proceed at once to collect the same by foreclosure of the mortgage, and that Louttit would be liable upon his note, given as collateral, only for the deficiency, if any. The Bolte note became due August 1, 1882; but no action was instituted and no steps taken to collect the same until 1886, when an action was commenced to foreclose. The amount of judgment for principal and interest and costs, and including costs of sale, amounted to $2,518.50. The amount realized from the sale, which was had July 23, 1887, was $1,800. This suit was commenced July 31, 1886. Upon these facts, the trial court held that plaintiff could not recover, and I think the conclusion must be sustained. The note was nonnegotiable, and therefore in the hands of the assignee any defense could be made which would have been good against the assignor. It also appears to have been assigned after it became due. The contract of Louttit was that of a guarantor of the deficiency after the mortgage security had been exhausted. It was the duty of the holder to proceed at once to realize upon the other security, and this he expressly agreed to do in the contract of guaranty. It needs no argument to show that a delay of nearly four years after the principal note became due is unreasonable. Furthermore, the action was prematurely brought. The guaranty was to pay the deficiency, and there was no deficiency until the sale of the mortgaged premises, and the sale took place after the suit was brought. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

McCORMICK v. BALDWIN. (No. 18,308.)

MINING CLAIM—ABANDONMENT — RESUMPTION OF WORK.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2324, provides that, in case of nonperformance of a certain amount of labor yearly on a mining claim, it shall be open to relocation, provided that the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, have not resumed work on the claim. Held, that to "resume work," within the provision of the statute, means to begin work anew with a bona fide intention of prosecuting it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Ejectment by Hamilton McCormick against George W. Baldwin, Jr., for mining lands. Verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Walling, for appellant. C. W. Kitts, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action of ejectment. The premises described in the complaint consist of certain quartz-mining property called the "Gracie Consolidated Q. M. Claims." They include three distinct mining locations or claims adjoining each other, called the "Big Blue" (or "Gracie"), on the east; the "Guernsey," in the center; and the "East Orleans," on the west. The defendant asserts title to certain quartz-mining claims which conflict with and include portions of said Guernsey and East Orleans claimed by plaintiff. The verdict and judgment were for defendant, and, from the judgment and order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

In the transcript and briefs many points touching mining law are made and suggested, but there is only one point which we deem it necessary to notice in detail, and that arises out of certain instructions of the court about the construction of the words "resume work," in section 2324, Rev. St. U. S.[1] The mining locations upon which appellant bases his right to the premises in controversy were made in the year 1885 and prior thereto. There is no pretense of evidence that he ever worked on the Guernsey or East Orleans, or that any work was ever done by him on the Big Blue prior to the year 1892. There is some evidence of some work done by appellant in a tunnel on the Big Blue in 1892, but from all the evidence in the case the jury must have found that if there was any work done on the Big Blue in 1892 it was entirely insufficient to hold the three claims under the United States statute, even though the work on the Big Blue could be applied to the other claims. But it was abundantly shown that the tunnel in the Big Blue in which appellant claimed to have worked in 1892 was of no use whatever in developing either of the other claims, and therefore could not be applied to the latter. Respondent made his locations, which included parts of the Guernsey and East Orleans, in February and April, 1893, and the Guernsey and East Orleans were then clearly subject to relocation, unless appellant, after the expiration of the year 1892, had resumed work within the meaning of the statute before respondent made his locations. Upon this subject the appellant testified that "on the 1st day of January, 1893, plaintiff performed about three hours' work on each of said three locations," and that on said day and the day following, January 2d, he dug a shaft on the Orleans about six feet deep. No more work was done by him afterwards. He contends that by these acts he had resumed work so as to invalidate any attempted hostile locations. Upon this subject the court gave several instructions, the substance of them being this: That a party cannot hold a mining claim for several years without doing in any year the work required, by simply going on it at the beginning of each year, and doing a few hours' work, with no bona fide intent to comply with the statutory requirement as to the amount of work to be done. In instruction No. 11 the word "and" is inadvertently used before the word "unless," but all the instructions taken together clearly showed to the jury what the court meant. The latter part of instruction No. 11 may be taken as a fair sample of the instructions objected to by appellant, and is as follows: "Unless, before the alleged location by the defendant of the ground in controversy, the plaintiff had done some work with the bona fide intention of doing the balance of the requisite work during the year 1893. It is against the policy of the law, and a fraud against the government and the law, to hold quartz claims by merely doing a few dollars' worth of work thereon at or near the beginning of the year next following the year on which claimant failed to do the necessary work, when such work is not commenced with the bona fide intention of being continued till the full amount is done. Such labor, so done, is a mere pretense and sham, and will not prevent the relocation for want of necessary work." This instruction, and the other instructions given by the court upon the subject, are, in our opinion, correct. To "resume work," within the meaning of said section 2324, is to actually begin work anew with a bona fide intention of prosecuting it as required by said section. Of course, it was for the jury to determine from all the evidence in the case whether or not the facts brought the case within the principle of the instructions. And under this view it is not necessary to examine the points made as to the validity of appellant's original locations, the validity of the old Stoddard claim of 1875, or the mesne conveyances thereof from Stoddard to Eastman, the contract between Eastman and Calvert, etc., or many other points made in the case. There was no substantial defect in the locations of respondent. We see nothing further in the case to be considered. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

[1] Rev. St. U. S. § 2324, provides: "On all claims located prior to the 10th day of May, 1872, ten dollars' worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made by the 10th day of June, 1874, and each year thereafter, for each 100 ft. in length along the vein until a patent has been issued therefor * * *; and upon a failure to comply with these conditions, the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation, * * * provided that the original locators, their heirs, assigns or legal representatives, have not resumed work on the claim after failure and before such location."

BLYTH et al. v. ROBINSON. (No. 14,543.)

BOND AGAINST MECHANICS' LIENS—MATERIAL MAN AS SURETY—EFFECT—RIGHT TO ENFORCE LIEN.

1. A bond by a contractor, indemnifying an owner against liens on his building, is valid, though the plans and specifications forming part of the building contract were not filed with the county recorder.

2. Where the surety on a bond given by a contractor to an owner, to indemnify the latter against mechanics' liens on his building, supplies to the contractor material for such building, and files a mechanic's lien therefor, and in consideration of the satisfaction of the lien the owner gives him his note for an amount less than the claim, the owner may, in an action on the note, set up as a defense the liability of the surety on his bond.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Blyth and others against Robinson on a promissory note. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. N. Wakeman, for appellants. A. P. Van Duzer, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This appeal is taken by the plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of the defendant. The only question arising upon the record before us is this: Do the findings of the court, read in connection with the facts admitted by the pleadings, sustain the judgment? The facts shown by the record are these: The defendant entered into a written agreement with one Houser for the alteration and repair of a certain house belonging to the defendant. The contract price of this work was $4,600, the said Houser to do all the work, and furnish at his own expense all the materials used in the alteration and repair of such building, and deliver the same to the defendant free from all liens on account of labor or materials. The contract price was to be paid in installments, three during the progress of the work, and the last, of $1,300, 35 days after the building was completed. Accompanying said contract was a bond in the sum of $4,000, executed to defendant by the said contractor, Houser, as principal, and the plaintiffs as sureties, "guarantying the performance of all the conditions of said contract on the part of the said Houser, and, among other things, that said house should be delivered to the defendant free from all liens that might arise from or be filed against said building on account of material or labor furnished by said Houser, and used in or about said structure." The plans and specifications forming a part of the contract for the alteration and repair of defendant's building were not filed in the office of the county recorder. The plaintiffs are lumber dealers, and they sold and delivered to the contractor, Houser, lumber of the value of $1,036, to be used by him in the alteration and repair of defendant's building, and for which sum they duly filed their claim of lien against said building. Upon the completion of Houser's contract, there remained unpaid to him only the last installment provided for by the contract, $1,300, and there were filed against the defendant's building liens which, together with the lien of plaintiffs, amounted to the sum of $2,360, and the contractor was wholly insolvent. The defendant paid the other liens upon the suggestion of plaintiffs, and after he had done so was informed by them of their claim and lien for $1,036. In respect to this the court finds that "plaintiffs then offered defendant to take his promissory note for the sum of nine hundred ($900) dollars, and cancel said lien, which offer defendant accepted, and said lien for ten hundred and twenty-six ($1,026) dollars was accordingly canceled." This action was brought by plaintiffs to recover the amount due upon the note referred to in the finding just quoted. The defendant in his answer pleaded a want of consideration for the note, growing out of the foregoing facts, and further alleged that he had been damaged by reason of the failure of the contractor to pay and discharge the lien of plaintiffs, in the sum of $925, the amount sued for, and that under the terms of the bond above mentioned he was entitled to recover such damages by way of set-off or counterclaim to plaintiffs' action. As a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts, the superior court found in substance that the counterclaim of defendant was established, and that he was entitled to a judgment against plaintiffs for his costs.

1. The bond executed by plaintiffs, and by the terms of which they undertook to protect the defendant against all claims for liens which might arise or be filed against his building on account of material or labor used or employed by Houser in the performance of his contract with defendant, was valid, notwithstanding the plans and specifications forming a part of the building contract were not filed with the county recorder. Kiessig v. Allspaugh, 91 Cal. 234, 27 Pac. 662; Id., 99 Cal. 452, 34 Pac. 106. This being so, the judgment of the superior court was right. The note sued on was without any legal consideration to support it. The cases cited by the appellants to the effect that forbearance to sue, or the compromise of a doubtful claim, constitutes a sufficient consideration for a promise, are not in point. The findings do not show that the note was given for the purpose of compromising a doubtful claim, and, as to the forbearance of plaintiffs to foreclose their lien against the defendant's building, they were already under a legal obligation not to foreclose such lien, by the terms of the bond executed by them, and in canceling this lien they conferred no benefit upon defendant to which he was not already legally entitled, and themselves suffered no detriment they were not already legally bound to suffer; and this was not a sufficient consideration for the note obtained from the defendant (Civ. Code, § 1605), and, as the findings show that there was no other consideration, the decision of the superior court might well have been rested upon the ground that such note was without consideration.

2. But, if we assume, as did the court below, that the note is not without a legal consideration to support it, still it is clear the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action. The note was given for the purpose of discharging one of the liens against which plaintiffs undertook to indemnify the defendant when they executed the bond as sureties for the contractor, and immediately upon the payment of such note a cause of action would have arisen, by virtue of the terms of such bond, in favor of defendant against the plaintiffs, for the amount so paid. Under such circumstances, and to avoid circuity of action, the defendant should be permitted to interpose plaintiffs' liability upon the bond as a defense to this action. The court did not find that defendant made any valid agreement to release plaintiffs from their obligation as sureties for the contractor, and no such legal effect was worked out by the mere fact that defendant executed the note sued on under the circumstances disclosed by the findings. The particular reason which moved him to execute his note in payment of plaintiffs' demand against the contractor does not appear, but it may be conjectured that he did so under the mistaken belief that the bond executed by plaintiffs was void because of the failure to file with the county recorder the plans and specifications referred to in the contract which it accompanied; but, whatever may have been his reason, it is sufficient to say that, so far as disclosed by this record, the giving of the note, although an unnecessary and unwise thing for defendant to do, did not destroy the obligation of the bond, and it is eminently just that the plaintiffs should not be permitted to escape their liability upon such bond, and in so escaping be permitted to reimburse themselves from defendant for the loss which they may have sustained in their dealings with the principal on the bond. Judgment affirmed.

FETTE v. LANE. (No. 18,264.)

CONVERSION BY MORTGAGEE — RIGHTS OF PRIOR MORTGAGEE—EVIDENCE AND FINDINGS —NOTICE OF PRIOR MORTGAGE.

1. Plaintiff took a mortgage on certain crops as security for a loan, and subsequently defendant took a mortgage on the same crop for seed furnished, and to secure future advances. Plaintiff's mortgage was not recorded. Held, that a finding, on conflicting evidence, that defendant had notice of plaintiff's mortgage before making the advances on the second mortgage, would not be disturbed.

2. An unrecorded mortgage of personal property is valid against a subsequent mortgagee with notice.

3. Where defendant's second mortgage for seed furnished was made before he had notice of plaintiff's prior unrecorded mortgage on the same crops, defendant has a prior lien to the extent of the seed furnished, but cannot enforce against the plaintiff liens for advances furnished the mortgagor after notice of the first mortgage.

4. In an action by the first mortgagee of crops to recover the amount of his lien from a second mortgagee, who has sold them, one of the mortgagors may testify as to a statement by plaintiff that it was understood that the crops should be sent to defendant subject to plaintiff's lien, in order to rebut an allegation that plaintiff had surrendered his lien.

5. A finding that barley subject to mortgages to plaintiff and defendant was to be stored by defendant in plaintiff's name, that he stored it in his own name, that plaintiff's demand of enough to secure his claim was not complied with, and that the barley was sold by defendant, and the proceeds retained by him, shows a conversion of the barley.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by F. Fette against Frank E. Lane to recover on a note secured by mortgage on crops sold by defendant under a second mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James H. & John E. Budd and Thompson & Paulsell, for appellant. Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was tried by the court. The findings, briefly stated, disclose the following facts: On March 31, 1892, O'Brien and Smith were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $564, and on that day executed to him their promissory note for that sum, payable August 1, 1892, with interest, and on the same day executed to the plaintiff a "crop mortgage" to secure the same, upon a crop of barley then growing on lands therein described. Prior to that time O'Brien and Smith procured from defendant the seed for said crop, amounting to 330 sacks, under an agreement to return two sacks of barley for each sack of seed; and on May 21, 1892, O'Brien and Smith executed to defendant a crop mortgage on the same crop previously mortgaged to plaintiff to secure to defendant the return of said two sacks for each one so furnished, and for the payment of such sums of money as defendant might advance to them, not exceeding $100. This mortgage further provided that the mortgagors were to care for and protect the crop while growing, and, when fit for harvesting, to harvest, thresh, clean, and sack the same, and deliver it to the mortgagee, to be by him held and disposed of for the payment of the moneys thereby secured; and in default of either of said acts the mortgagee was authorized to enter and take possession and harvest, thresh and sack the same, and all expenses so incurred, including hauling, storing, and delivery, were to be secured by the mortgage, and first paid; and for all these purposes the mortgagee was constituted the attorney in fact of the mortgagors, with power to sell and dispose of the same at such times and for such sums as he might deem proper. This mortgage was duly recorded on the day of its execution, but the prior mortgage to plaintiff was not recorded. It was further found by the court that, after the execution of the mortgage to the defendant, but before any advances or expenditures were made thereunder, the defendant was informed of the prior mortgage to the plaintiff; that, subsequent to the execution of said mortgage to defendant, and prior to the harvesting of the crop, it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that when the crop should be harvested and sacked the whole of it should be shipped to defendant at Stockton, and be by him stored in the name of the plaintiff, and held for the satisfaction of plaintiff's said claim; that with the consent of O'Brien and Smith the whole of the crop, amounting to 4,525 sacks, was shipped to defendant, who stored the same in his own name; that thereafter plaintiff demanded that defendant turn over to him so much thereof as was necessary to secure the note held by plaintiff, but defendant refused to do so, and thereafter sold at private sale the whole thereof, amounting to $3,468.77, and received and appropriated the whole thereof to his own use; that no proceedings were taken to foreclose said mortgage, nor any notice of sale given; that the money so received by defendant was largely in excess of the sums due under both said mortgages and all sums expended in harvesting the barley, and that no part of plaintiff's note against O'Brien and Smith had been paid. One or two other facts found by the court will be noticed in another connection. Upon these findings judgment was entered for plaintiff for the amount due on said note, and the defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The questions principally discussed are as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings. It could serve no useful purpose to discuss the evidence in detail. A few points only can be noticed. The finding that defendant had knowledge of plaintiff's mortgage before he made any advances or expenditures on account of the mortgaged property is justified by the evidence. The evidence is clear that he had such knowledge, but as to the precise time when such knowledge was obtained the evidence is conflicting. The finding of the court, therefore, cannot be disturbed.

That defendant made large advances to O'Brien and Smith, which he was not required to make under the terms of his mortgage, and which were not secured by it, even if plaintiff's mortgage had never existed, is clear from defendant's testimony. He said: "Smith and O'Brien's account had exceeded the amount of my mortgage to such an extent that I thought I ought to be secure, and so attached the crop." The amount for which the attachment was issued appears from defendant's testimony to have been $1,236, and the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that he received from the sales of the barley a sum of money largely in excess of the amounts secured by both mortgages. No judgment was taken in the attachment proceeding, and, after the barley was all delivered to defendant, the attachment was dismissed. Plaintiff claimed, and the court found, that an agreement was made between plaintiff and defendant to the effect that defendant should receive all the barley, and store it in plaintiff's name, to the end that his claim should be paid, thus giving defendant the opportunity of applying the remainder to the payment of his claim, this arrangement being assented to by Smith and O'Brien. Appellant contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence, but that, on the contrary, plaintiff agreed to take the barley, and pay defendant $1,700, and further to guaranty the payment of the harvesting expenses. The evidence shows that there were negotiations looking to the arrangement last above stated, but the two propositions appear to have been under consideration at the same time. That plaintiff made the offer to pay the $1,700 is conceded by him, but plaintiff wanted the barley stored at Sperry's warehouse; that, if it was not stored there, he was afraid he should have to pay storage twice; and the conclusion seems to have been arrived at which is stated in the finding of the court. The plaintiff testified further that he left his note and mortgage with defendant for collection, and that defendant told him to come "in a couple of days," and get his money; while defendant testified that he never agreed to assume plaintiff's obligation against Smith and O'Brien, "only that when I was paid he should be paid." It would be idle for us to attempt to reconcile these conflicts, and, not being able to do so, we cannot disturb the findings.

Appellant's counsel say in their brief that "the amount secured to Lane [the defendant] by the mortgage, exclusive of the insurance money, was $3,474.96, and the amount of sales $3,468.77, so that the amount received from sales was insufficient to pay the amount secured to be paid exclusive of insurance." The sum above stated is the entire indebtedness of O'Brien and Smith to defendant, except the insurance, and includes $1,236, which appears from the testimony of defendant to have been the amount for which the attachment was issued. As the attachment could not issue without an affidavit that the amount claimed was not secured by a mortgage or other lien, the defendant cannot well insist that his whole claim is secured by his mortgage.

It is also insisted by appellant that, as plaintiff's mortgage was not recorded, it is void as against creditors and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith and for value. Civ. Code, § 1217, provides: "An unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof." "The object to be attained by requiring the recording of mortgages of personal property is the same as that in providing for the registration of mortgages of real estate. The same general principles are alike applicable in each case." Berson v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 552.

As to the barley furnished by defendant for seed, defendant's subsequent mortgage, taken without notice of the prior unrecorded mortgage, is entitled to the first lien. It is not necessary to consider how far, and as to what expenditures, made after knowledge of plaintiff's mortgage, defendant's mortgage may be held to constitute a prior lien, since the mortgaged property exceeds the amount secured to both plaintiff and defendant under their respective mortgages, and hence the question of priority is unimportant. Nor could the attachment of the property by defendant, after notice of plaintiff's mortgage, affect his lien, even if the attachment had not been dismissed; but, if it were otherwise, the attachment having been discharged, no lien remained except those created by the mortgage. For the purposes of this decision it may be conceded that plaintiff expended nothing in harvesting the crop, and that defendant paid all the expenses, and that the expenses of harvesting and storing the crop were a prior lien under defendant's mortgage, for the result reached by the trial court would still be right, inasmuch as the other advances not required by the mortgage, and included in the attachment, are more than sufficient to satisfy plaintiff's lien.

As to the manner in which the barley was sold, we think the plaintiff does not stand in a position to question it. If enough had not been realized to satisfy plaintiff's lien after satisfying such part of defendant's lien as was prior to his, the question might be material. Both liens having been satisfied, the only parties interested in that question are Smith and O'Brien, and they are not in court. A discussion of the question is, therefore, not only unnecessary, but improper.

Smith, one of the mortgagors, called by plaintiff, was asked whether he, O'Brien, Fette, and Lane had an understanding as to how and to whom the grain should be shipped? The witness answered: "Yes, sir. We had an understanding. Mr. Fette told me he had an understanding with Mr. Lane." Defendant objected to what Fette told the witness unless Lane was present. Counsel for plaintiff then stated they did not offer it to bind Mr. Lane, but to meet an allegation of a surrender of plaintiff's lien. The court overruled the objection, and the witness said: "We didn't have an understanding with Mr. Lane,—at least I didn't,—how to ship it. All the understanding I had was, Mr. Fette told me that he had an understanding with Mr. Lane to ship the barley to Mr. Lane in Mr. Fette's name." We think the evidence was competent for the purpose for which it was introduced, and that the court properly refused a motion to strike it out. It was not evidence against Lane to show that he had assented or agreed that the barley should be shipped or stored in plaintiff's name, but was competent to show that Fette still claimed a right under his mortgage, and had not, as was alleged, abandoned his lien.

It is also contended that there was no conversion by defendant. But the finding that the barley was to be stored by defendant in plaintiff's name, that he stored it in his own name, that plaintiff demanded a delivery of so much thereof as would secure his claim, that such demand was not complied with, and that defendant sold the barley and retained the proceeds, comes so near to showing a conversion that Chitty could not have discovered the difference. Counsel's contention, if based on their construction of the evidence, as was doubtless intended, might lead to a different conclusion.

After a careful review of the evidence and the arguments of counsel it must be said that, wherein there is any doubt of the correctness of any of the findings, the testimony is so conflicting that they must be permitted to stand. Nor can we even say that upon the evidence we would have made different findings. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C., BELCHER, C.

BEQUETTE v. PATTERSON. (No. 18,254.)

HIGHWAYS—PRESCRIPTION—PUBLIC LANDS—REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS.

1. In trespass for the removal of a fence built by plaintiff, evidence showing that the space across which it was built was originally a race track, but was connected at different points with public roads, and had been used continuously for 14 years as a public highway, justifies a finding that it was a public highway.

2. Act Cong. 1866 granted a right of way for highways over public lands not reserved for public use, and patents to such lands are taken subject to the easement of such highway.

3. An illegal obstruction may be removed from a highway, at the direction of the board of supervisors, by one who is not a road overseer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Trespass by P. Bequette against William Patterson, road overseer, for the removal of a fence. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tuttle & Tuttle, for appellant. A. K. Robinson and Wallace & Wallace, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Plaintiff, claiming to be the owner of certain land through which an alleged highway ran, closed up the road by fencing across it. The defendant removed the fence, and plaintiff brought an action of trespass to recover damages laid at $100, and for an injunction against threatened trespasses of a like character, if plaintiff should again erect the fence. The defendant answered, denying plaintiff's ownership of the land; alleging that he was road overseer of the district including this road, that the road in question was and is a public highway, that the fence was an obstruction and nuisance, and that he removed it under an order made by the board of supervisors; and denied that plaintiff had sustained damage. For a separate answer he alleged that plaintiff threatened to renew the obstruction, and prayed for an injunction. The cause was tried by the court, and upon the findings judgment was entered for the defendant. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Appellant attacks the findings, and also specifies numerous errors of law occurring upon the trial.

We think the evidence is sufficient to justify the finding that the way in question is a public highway. That it was originally intended for and was used as a race track appears probable. It was not, however, a circular track, but was nearly straight, was adjacent to the town of Forest Hill, and connected at each end with public roads; and there is much evidence tending to show that for many years it had been used by teams, stages, and other travel. By one of the witnesses it was spoken of as a "back street." The way appears to have been known as the "Race Track" some 30 years ago, and, though travel over it has been at times interrupted, there seems to have been no interruption for the last 12 or 14 years, until the erection of the fence by the plaintiff, which was removed by the defendant. The court also found that the way had been legally and actually dedicated by Charles Harley before the plaintiff became the owner of the land. Whether this finding is sustained by the evidence it is not necessary to consider. A dedication of the way, either express or implied from long and uninterrupted use, having been found, the finding that plaintiff is not the owner of the parcel of land over which the road passes becomes immaterial, for if it is a public highway the ownership of the land could give him no right to obstruct it; and for a like reason it is immaterial whether the county owns the fee of the land covered by the way, or only an easement, since in either case it has the right to an unobstructed way.

It seems to be contended that, because the land over which the road lies was not patented by the United States until 1889, the right to use the way could not have been acquired by the public until after that time. The act of congress of 1866 granted the right of way for highways over public lands not reserved for public uses, and a patent from the United States is taken subject to the easement of such highway. McRose v. Bottyer, 81 Cal. 122, 22 Pac. 393. This land was patented to Harley in 1889, and plaintiff could not acquire from him a better title, as against the road, than Harley had under his patent.

Appellant further contends that the defendant was not the road overseer of that district at the date of the alleged trespass, and that the finding that he was is not justified by the evidence, because his official bond was not approved until the day after the trespass. He had, however, taken the oath of office, the sureties on his bond had qualified, and he testified that in removing the fence he acted as roadmaster, and did it by direction of the board of supervisors. He was at least an officer de facto, but if he was not, as the board of supervisors have charge of the roads, and the obstruction was illegal, the defendant might lawfully remove it by their direction.

The sixth finding is not obnoxious to the objection that it is a mere conclusion of law. It finds that said road "now is, and was at all times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, and for more than twenty years last past has been, a public road or highway, used and treated as such by the road officers of Placer county, and duly constructed as such in the manner required by law." The findings as a whole are inartificially drawn, and include some matters not essential to the support of the judgment; but, so far as essential they are sufficiently clear to be comprehended, and they support the judgment.

There are some exceptions to rulings upon evidence. That some immaterial evidence was admitted in reasonably clear, but we do not see that plaintiff was or could be prejudiced by the testimony so admitted, and the same may be said as to the exclusion of some evidence offered by the plaintiff. None of these rulings were upon a vital point in the case, nor of such character as would benefit the profession to discuss or decide. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VAN CLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

RAYMOND v. GLOVER et al. (No. 19,335.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1894.)

Additional opinion. For former opinion, see 37 Pac. 772.

PER CURIAM. The opinion heretofore filed herein is modified by striking out the following paragraph: "Whatever, therefore, may be the rights of the bank, as against Glover, I think it plain that plaintiff is entitled to the first lien upon the property to secure her debt of $1,300," —and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Whatever, therefore, may be the rights of the bank, the plaintiff, as against Glover, is entitled to a lien upon the property to secure her debt of $1,300." The judgment rendered herein is set aside, and the following judgment is given: For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the cause is remanded, with directions to find whether or not the bank took the note as security, without notice of the facts showing the equities in favor of the plaintiff. This fact may be found upon the evidence already taken, with such further evidence upon that subject as the parties may see fit to submit. If the court finds that the appellant took the note as security, without notice of the facts showing such equities, judgment should be rendered giving to the appellant a first lien upon the property for the amount of its claim, and to the plaintiff a second lien thereon to the extent of $1,300 and interest, as provided in the contract of sale.

PEOPLE ex rel. HARGRAVE v. MARKHAM, Governor. (No. 15,877.)

ELECTION OF JUDGES—TERM OF OFFICE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

St. 1893, p. 168, creating the county of Madera, and providing that the judge of the superior court elected at the special election called to complete the organization of the county should hold office till the first Monday in January, 1897, is in conflict with Const. art. 6, § 6, which provides that a judge of the superior court for each county shall be elected at the general state election, whose term shall commence on the first Monday of January next succeeding his election, in so far as it attempts to extend the term of the judge beyond the first Monday in January next after the special election.

In bank.

Mandamus by the people ex rel. Hargrave to compel H. H. Markham, governor, to include in his election proclamation a call for the election of a judge of the superior court of Madera county. Writ allowed.

Wm. T. Searles and W. H. Larew, for petitioner. Robert L. Hargrave, in pro per. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen. (Francis A. Fee, of counsel), for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an agreed case by which the question is submitted to the court whether at the approaching general election a judge of the superior court of the county of Madera is to be chosen by popular vote. In form the proceeding is a petition for a writ of mandate to the governor commanding him to include in his forthcoming election proclamation a call for the election of said judge. No question is raised as to the power of the court to issue its mandate to the head of the executive department of the state government, but, on the contrary, it is conceded that if the question stated is answered in the affirmative the writ shall issue. The county of Madera was created by an act of the legislature approved March 11, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 168), out of territory theretofore included in the county of Fresno. The act provided, among other things, for the appointment of a board of commissioners to call, conduct, and verify the results of a special election of the officers necessary to complete the organization of the county. Among the officers to be so chosen, a judge of the superior court was expressly included. In pursuance of these provisions a special election was held in said county on the 16th of May, 1893, and on the 20th of the same month said board of commissioners declared the county to be duly organized. Among other officers chosen at said special election the Honorable W. M. Conley was elected to the office of judge of the superior court, and on the 23d day of May he received from the governor a commission empowering him to hold said office "for the term provided by law." The question to be decided here is, when does that term expire? or, in other words, when does a regular term of the office to be filled by choice of the electors at a regular election commence? By section 14 of the act creating the county it is provided that: "The judge of the superior court chosen under this act shall hold his office until the first Monday in January, eighteen hundred and ninety-seven, and until his successor is elected and qualified." If this provision is not in conflict with the constitution, it is plain that the first regular full term of the office does not commence until January, 1897, and, consequently, that no judge of said court is to be chosen before the general state election in November, 1896. Const. art. 6, § 6. But the relator contends that by this very section of the constitution the commencement of the first regular full term of every newly-created superior judgeship is fixed for the first Monday in January after the next ensuing general election, and, consequently, that the legislature exceeded its power in attempting to extend the term of the judge to be chosen at the special election in Madera county beyond the first Monday of January, 1895. We think this contention must be sustained. The legislature has the undoubted power to create new counties, and when a new county is created the office of superior judge of such county necessarily springs into existence. Const. art. 6, § 6. Additional judges may also be provided for in the old counties. Id. § 9. Whenever one of these new offices is created, there is, of course, a necessity that it should be provisionally filled in some manner until the commencement of a regular constitutional term; and, if the constitution is silent upon this point, the power of the legislature to make such provisional arrangement by statute cannot be questioned. But, if the constitution has fixed the commencement of the first regular term of such newly-created office, the legislature has no power to fill the office for a term extending beyond the date so fixed. We think the constitution has prescribed a rule which applies not only to the counties in existence at the date of its adoption, and to the office of superior judge therein, but to all counties organized thereafter, and to all additional judgeships, however created. "There shall be in each of the organized counties and cities and counties of the state a superior court, for each of which at least one judge shall be elected by the qualified electors of the county or city and county at the general state election. * * * The term of office of judges of the superior courts shall be six years from and after the first Monday of January next succeeding their election." Const. art. 6, § 6. The words, "at the general state election," as applied to newly-created judgeships, must have some definite meaning ascribed to them, and the only definite meaning they can have is the first general election after the creation of the office. If they do not mean the first election, they certainly do not mean the second or third; and if the legislature can extend the term of the judge provisionally elected or appointed beyond the first Monday in January after the first general election, they have the power to extend it indefinitely,—a power for which no one would be so bold as to contend.

It might perhaps have been plausibly argued when this question was a new one that the regular terms of all newly-created judgeships should correspond with those established by the constitution for the old counties, viz. that they should commence in 1885, 1891, 1897, and so on; but when the legislature was first called upon to give its construction to the constitution it rejected this view in favor of the one first above stated. By the act providing for an additional judge in San Bernardino county (St. 1887, p. 19) it recognized the first Monday in January, 1889, as the commencement of the first regular term of the office, and the validity of the act was sustained by this court in People v. Waterman, 86 Cal. 28, 24 Pac. 807. In all subsequent acts providing for additional judges in the older counties the same rule has been followed. San Diego, St. 1889, p. 5; San Luis Obispo, Id. p. 6; Los Angeles, Id. p. 130; Tulare, St. 1891, p. 61; Alameda, St. 1893, p. 3. As to the first three of these acts (of 1889) they of course fit either view as to the commencement of the regular terms, but the last two, and the act of 1887, fit only the view which we have approved. In organizing new counties the legislature has followed this view in the act creating Riverside. St. 1893, p. 3. The act creating Orange county (St. 1889, p. 6) conforms to either view, while the acts creating Glenn, Madera, and Kings counties (St. 1891, p. 98; St. 1893, pp. 168, 179) seem to have been based upon the theory suggested that the regular terms commence only in the years 1885, 1891, 1897, etc. The legislature, it will thus be seen, has in this matter been inconsistent with itself, and we think has, in the three acts last cited, transgressed the constitution, both in its letter and in its spirit. There is no one thing more apparent in the whole tenor of the constitution than the desire of its framers to establish regularity and uniformity throughout the whole frame and system of the government, and it is not to be supposed that they would leave as important a matter as the regular terms of the superior judges wholly unprovided for. On the contrary, it must be held, if any language of the constitution will warrant us in so doing, that a precise rule on this subject has been laid down, and this rule ought to be harmonized, as far as possible, with another leading idea of the framers of the constitution, viz. that the people, as a rule, should choose their public officers at the general elections, and that other modes of filling offices provisionally should be limited to cases of necessity.

Upon these considerations, and upon what we deem the soundest construction of the constitution, we hold, in accordance with the view which has generally found favor with the legislature, that a superior judge should be chosen in Madera county at the approaching regular election for a full constitutional term. Nothing decided in People v. Waterman, supra, is in conflict with this view, and, when the language of the opinion is considered with reference to the fact that the election there referred to was a general state election, it will be seen that it does not apply to this case. Let the peremptory writ issue.

RICHARD v. HUPP. (No. 18,259.)

EASEMENT—FLUME CONSTRUCTED OVER ANOTHER'S LAND—EVIDENCE OF ABANDONMENT.

1. Plaintiff constructed a flume 564 feet long in the bed of a stream to convey the water from his mine. The flume extended 400 feet on land below, owned by defendant. Eighteen years later, defendant built a dam across the stream, causing the water to flow back, but not further than the limit of his land. Held, in an action to abate the dam as a nuisance, there being evidence that the flume was built as an adjunct to plaintiff's quartz mill, that evidence that the mill was no longer in operation, and that its condition for many years had been such that it could not be used, was admissible to show an abandonment of any prescriptive easement which plaintiff may have had over defendant's land.

2. To establish a prescriptive right to an easement, the user must have been continuous, adverse, under claim of title, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner of the servient estate.

3. The refusal of a motion to amend the complaint, made after the decision in the case was rendered, to conform with evidence that the erection of the dam by defendant obstructed the flow of debris and tailings from mines above plaintiff's land, was within the discretion of the trial court.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; E. A. Davis, Judge.

Action by Joseph Richard against John Hupp to abate a nuisance caused by the erection of a dam by defendant flooding plaintiff's mines. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Gale, for appellant. Warren Sexton and F. C. Lusk, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to abate a nuisance averred to have been caused by the erection of a dam by defendant across a water course in Butte county, known as "Little Butte Creek," whereby the water of said creek is caused to flow back upon and submerge the quartz mining claim of plaintiff. The cause was tried by the court, without the intervention of a jury, and written findings filed, upon which judgment was entered in favor of defendant for costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Plaintiff, who is appellant here, is, and he and his grantors have been, the owners of and in possession of a quartz mining claim situate and being in section 36, township 24 N., range 3 E., M. D. M. Plaintiff and his co-owners, in 1870 and 1871, constructed a flume running from said mine about 564 feet down the bed of Little Butte creek. Said flume was built in the bottom of a rock cut from two to five feet deep, and the top of the rock cut was from three to six feet below the natural bed of the creek. All of said flume, except 160 feet of the upper end thereof, is upon land owned by the defendant. The flume was used by plaintiff and his co-owners to convey water from their mine, and to some extent for placer mining. The mill of plaintiff has not been used since 1873, and the mill has gone to decay. In 1881, third parties, who had a bond from plaintiff, pumped out the mine, and took out some quartz, but, so far as appears, did not work it. The flume went to decay, and, as the court found, nothing is left of it but the ruins in the bed of the rock cut. Defendant is the owner in fee simple of the N. W. ¼ of section 1 in township 32 N., of range 3 E., M. D. M., under a pre-emption settlement and entry made in 1868, and a United States patent issued in 1871 to one Nelson, the grantor of said defendant. There is also evidence and a finding as to the ownership by the defendant of a mining claim on the creek between his patented land and the lower or south line of plaintiff's quartz claim, the ownership of which, however, is unimportant to the decision of the case. In 1888 defendant constructed a dam across the creek upon his patented land, about 600 feet below plaintiff's mining claim, and a short distance below certain falls in the creek, for the purpose of diverting the water of the stream for mining and irrigation. The dam so constructed by the defendant is about three feet higher than the crest of the falls, and sets the water back in the stream, but does not overflow or set the water back above defendant's own land, or upon or over the mining claim of plaintiff, or injure it in any manner. That the water so set back overflows a portion of the rock cut in which plaintiff's flume was constructed, but such portion is upon defendant's patented land; and that plaintiff is not the owner thereof, and has no easement in defendant's land, or right to use the same for the purpose of maintaining a flume thereon. The findings are quite full upon all the issues, and are only stated to the extent deemed necessary to an understanding and elucidation of the points made by appellant. At the trial, objection was made by appellant to testimony tending to show the condition of his mine; that it had not been worked since 1873; that the mill building had fallen down; the flume which carried water to the wheel had disappeared; that the wheel and machinery had gone to decay, etc.,—which objection was overruled, an exception taken, and the ruling is assigned as error.

The theory of appellant is that the testimony shows an injury inflicted by respondent upon the rights of appellant, which, if permitted to continue, might ripen into a right, and hence the interposition of equity was properly invoked, and that appellant's rights are not to be measured by the value of his property. This argument assumes an existing right in appellant, while a vital question under the pleadings related to the existence of such right. It must be conceded under the evidence that defendant's reservoir did not back the water above his own line or off his own land. If plaintiff had any easement or right of way over defendant's land for his flume it must have been by virtue of a prior appropriation, or by a continuous adverse user for a period commensurate with that fixed by the statute of limitations, viz. for five years. A right acquired by appropriation may be lost by voluntary abandonment. Evidence of nonuser during the period necessary to perfect a prescriptive right tends to show its nonexistence. There was evidence tending to show plaintiff's flume as an appurtenant to his mill and mining claim. Under these circumstances, it was proper to show that operations at the mill had been discontinued, and that its condition was, and for many years had been, such that it could not be used, not for the purpose of impeaching plaintiff's right to the mine, but to show an abandonment of the right of way, if any, over defendant's land, or such nonuser as would preclude the inference that a prescriptive title ever ripened into existence. A right acquired by prescription to an easement is measured by the extent of the continuous enjoyment, and must be adverse, that is to say, "It must have been asserted under claim of title, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the person having the prior (superior) right, and must have been uninterrupted." Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. 645; American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 361. "In order to constitute a right by prescription, there must have been such an invasion of the rights of the party against whom it is claimed that he would have had ground of action against the intruder." Water Co. v. Hancock, supra; Anaheim Water Co. v. Semi-Tropic Water Co., 64 Cal. 185, 30 Pac. 623. It follows that if the flume ceased to be used, and if the property in connection with which it was used was in such condition that no user of the flume could be had, it was competent to prove such fact to show that a prescriptive right did not and could not vest in appellant to have and continue his flume upon the land of respondent.

The cause was brought to trial March 3, 1891, and submitted to the court for decision March 4, 1891. On the 14th day of March, 1891, the court filed its written decision directing findings in favor of defendant to be prepared and presented, which findings were filed April 6, 1891. After the decision was announced, and before the findings were filed, but at what precise date does not appear, counsel for plaintiff appeared in open court, and asked leave to amend his complaint so as to conform to the evidence, by averring, in substance, that for many years mining had been carried on upon Little Butte creek; and that in times of high water large quantities of tailings and mining debris have been washed down to and upon plaintiff's claims; and that, by the construction and maintenance of defendant's dam, such tailings were prevented from flowing down the creek as they would otherwise have done, and were caused to lodge upon and cover plaintiff's claim and flume, whereby he was injured and disturbed in the enjoyment of his property. The court refused to permit the plaintiff to so amend his complaint, to which ruling his counsel in due time excepted, and the ruling is now assigned as error. In the course of the trial, the witnesses, in describing the condition of the stream and the property of the plaintiff, incidentally, as it appears to us, described the conditions of the stream as to mining debris and certain dams above plaintiff's flume which had been carried out by floods and never replaced, by reason whereof the wheel of plaintiff and the flume had been to a greater or less degree submerged and clogged by the debris. The granting or refusing leave to amend under such circumstances and at such a time was a matter in the discretion of the court, with the exercise of which this court will not interfere except in case of abuse. No abuse of discretion is apparent in the present instance. It may well be that the court below saw that, if the amendment was allowed, justice would have demanded that the case be reopened, and a further trial of the new issues created thereby had. Be this as it may, no abuse of discretion is made to appear, and hence no error can be predicated on the refusal. The cases cited by appellant are either without application, or refer to instances in which the leave to amend was sought pending the trial. The case of Bradley v. Parker (decided by this court September 28, 1893) 34 Pac. 234, is on all fours with the case at bar, and what is said there need not be repeated.

Appellant contends that the findings are contradictory, indefinite, and inconsistent, and that there is no finding as to appellant's alleged title or right of possession to the flume described in the complaint. We think the findings, taken as a whole, are consistent, clear, and comprehensive. They may be in part epitomized as follow: (1) Plaintiff owns the mine. (2) He built the flume in 1870–71. (3) It is 564 feet long, and all of it except the upper 160 feet is on defendant's land. (4) The flume had not been used for 10 years. (5) Plaintiff is not the owner of that portion of the flume on defendant's land,—that is to say, the lower 404 feet thereof,—and has no easement over said land for the purpose of maintaining said flume, and no right to use said land for the purposes of said flume. (6) That the dam does not cause water to flow back on any of plaintiff's property. (7) The dam does not cause water to flow back on plaintiff's flume. (8) The dam does submerge a part of the flume or rock cut, but the part so submerged is the property of defendant, "and plaintiff has no right or interest in or to any part of it." (9) Defendant is the owner, in possession of, and entitled to the possession of all the lands in any wise affected by the waters accumulated, flooded, or submerged by said dam. (10) Plaintiff has not sustained any injury or damage. (11) Defendant's title to the land flooded was initiated in 1868, and he constructed the dam in 1888, for a useful purpose, viz. to divert water for mining and irrigating, and is using it for such purposes. There are other findings which are in accord with the foregoing. That the evidence supports these findings we cannot doubt, and that they support the judgment is equally clear. To analyze the evidence and discuss it at length would only lead to the conclusion that plaintiff, without authority or right in him so to do, constructed the lower end of his flume upon the land of plaintiff, and that the evidence was sufficient to authorize the court below to find (1) that the user was not of sufficient duration and sufficiently continuous for five years to give to the plaintiff a prescriptive right to have and maintain the same on defendant's land; or (2) if such prescriptive right was established by user, that the same was lost by abandonment. It follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

BURRIS v. PEOPLE'S DITCH CO. (No. 18,-294.)

EASEMENT—RIGHTS OF OWNER—DITCH ON ANOTHER'S LAND—ALTERATION AND REPAIR — PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF ANSWER.

1. The owner of an irrigation ditch has, as against the owner of land through which it runs, the right, in making repairs, to deepen it from 1 to 17 inches for a distance of 140 feet, and to gradually lower the bed thereof 1 foot in a distance of 170 feet, where the object is to make the ditch of a uniform grade, and to remove from its bottom local irregularities, and the repairs do not increase the flow of water.

2. Where a complaint alleges a material widening and deepening of an irrigation ditch running through plaintiff's land, a denial of the allegation, followed by an averment that "on the contrary * * * said ditch is no wider, nor is it any deeper, * * * than when it was first constructed," raises the issue as to whether the ditch has been materially widened or deepened.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by David Burris against the People's Ditch Company. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Daggett & Adams, for appellant. Bradley & Farnsworth, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The defendant is the owner of a canal or ditch used to convey water from Kings river for the purpose of irrigation. This ditch was constructed in 1875, is about 20 miles long, and in its course crosses two sections of land owned by the plaintiff. The complaint charges that in December, 1887, the defendant widened and deepened the ditch upon plaintiff's lands, and prays for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendant to restore the ditch to its former condition. The defendant answered, and the issues were tried by the court, and upon the findings made judgment was entered for the defendant. This appeal is by the plaintiff upon the judgment roll.

The court found that when said ditch was constructed across section 14 it had a width on the bottom of about 25 feet, was a little wider at the top, and was about 6 feet in depth from the surface of the ground, and from the top of the embankment about 10 feet; that on section 26 the ditch was about 30 feet wide on the bottom, was about 2 feet in depth below the surface of the ground, and from the top of the embankments its depth was about 4 feet, and that said ditch is no wider now than when first constructed, and is not any deeper, except as hereinafter stated; that in December, 1887, the defendant, against the protest of the plaintiff, entered upon said ditch to clean out the same, and increased the depth of it for a distance of 140 yards in section 14 of plaintiff's lands from 1 foot to 17 inches, and on section 26 deepened it from 1 foot at the upper end of a "170-yard stretch, tapering down to nothing at the lower end of said stretch;" that said portions of the ditch were deepened to reduce the ditch to an even and uniform grade, "said portions having theretofore been looked upon as humps in the bottom of the ditch," but that no more water is conveyed through the ditch than before. The court further found that plaintiff's lands were not thereby damaged, nor the burden increased, nor the plaintiff obstructed in the free use of any of his lands, or prevented from the comfortable enjoyment of any thereof, or that he suffered any pecuniary loss or damage.

Appellant contends that the findings show that he is entitled to the relief demanded, and asks for a reversal of the judgment, and that he have judgment on the findings. It is well settled that the owner of an easement cannot change its character, or materially increase the burden upon the servient estate, or injuriously affect the rights of other persons, but within the limits named he may make repairs, improvements, or changes that do not affect its substance. An easement of the character involved in this case is property, to the reasonable and profitable use and improvement of which, due regard being had to the rights of others, the owner is entitled. Bringing the ditch to a uniform grade by removing local inequalities, such as are stated in the findings, is not a deepening of the ditch. The prescriptive right, as to depth, is determined by the grade and general depth of the ditch, and not by local and unimportant irregularities in the bottom of it. The ditch was not widened, nor the quantity of water conveyed increased, nor the mode or purpose of its use changed. It is argued that, if defendant had the right to do what the court found was done, defendant would have the right to dig the ditch a hundred feet deeper; that in principle there is no difference between deepening it one inch and a hundred feet. There is, however, the difference between that which is material and that which is immaterial. Suppose plaintiff had acquired by prescription a private way for a few rods over his neighbor's land; that at the time he first used the way he found a tree growing in the middle of it, and instead of digging it up had cut it down so low that his wagon could pass over it, and had so used the way for five years. Would it be claimed that he might not afterwards dig up the stump? or, if he did, that his neighbor could obtain a mandatory injunction to require him to put the stump back where it grew? None of the cases cited by appellant sustain his contention. They either involve facts of a different nature, or are based upon a change of the character of the easement, or a material increase of the burden upon the servient estate. In Allen v. Water Co., 92 Cal. 138, 28 Pac. 215, principally relied upon by appellant, this court sustained the right of the plaintiff to an injunction upon the ground that the change from the open ditch to a pipe laid under ground was "a change in the character of the easement." In this case there was no change in the character of the easement, or the mode of its use or enjoyment, nor was any injury inflicted upon the plaintiff. The work done the defendant had the right to do, and the injunction was properly denied.

It is further contended that the finding that the ditch was not widened or deepened is in conflict with admissions in defendant's answer. The complaint charged a material widening and deepening, and the contention is that this allegation is not denied, and is therefore admitted. It is conceded that the denial is not in good form, and if it stood alone would be insufficient. But the pleader, after making a literal denial as to the width and depth alleged in the complaint, added: "But, on the contrary, defendant alleges that said ditch is no wider, nor is it any deeper, through the said lands of plaintiff than it was when it was first constructed." This allegation was sufficient to put in issue the said allegations of the complaint. Way v. Oglesby, 45 Cal. 655; Goddard v. Fulton, 21 Cal. 430, at page 436; Robinson v. Merrill, 87 Cal., at page 14, 25 Pac. 162. It may be said, generally, that any allegation in an answer which, if found to be true, necessarily shows that the allegation of the complaint as to the same matter is untrue, is a good traverse, and sufficient as a denial. We see no inconsistency in the findings. The inconsistency claimed rests upon the assertion that the removal of the "humps" was a "deepening" of the ditch, —a proposition that need not be further discussed. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

OWEN v. MEADE. (No. 18,258.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1894.)

ACTION FOR ATTORNEY'S SERVICES — PLEADING AND PROOF — ASSIGNMENT OF CLAIM — CORRECTION PENDING SUIT.

1. In an action for attorney's services, proof that the attorney's compensation was contingent on the result of litigation does not sustain an allegation that defendant agreed to pay a fixed sum for such services.

2. Where the complaint alleges that defendant agreed to pay a fixed sum for the services, evidence that such sum was a reasonable fee if its payment was made contingent on the result of the litigation is inadmissible.

3. Where an assignment of a claim failed to name the assignee, and, on the trial of an action thereon, plaintiff introduces parol evidence that he was the assignee, and that his name was omitted by mistake, and offers to have the assignment corrected by the assignor by inserting his name, the court should permit the correction.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by R. T. Owen against O. J. Meade for attorney's services. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Stanton L. Carter, for appellant. James Gallagher, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff sues as the assignee of one Grady, to recover the sum of $950, balance alleged to be due for professional services rendered by the said Grady in the prosecution of a certain action brought by the defendant against the county of Fresno. The complaint, which is unverified, alleges that the defendant expressly agreed to pay to said Grady for such services the sum of $1,000, and also alleges that the services so rendered by Grady were reasonably worth the sum of $1,000. The answer contains a general denial, and, in addition, sets out a separate defense, in which it is alleged "that the only services rendered by said W. D. Grady were done and performed under and upon a special contract and agreement with said Grady that he (said Grady) would do and perform the service to be rendered and performed under said agreement for the sum of $50," and that Grady was paid said sum before the alleged assignment to plaintiff. The action was tried by a jury, and the plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court for the full amount demanded in the complaint; and from this judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant appeals.

1. Grady, the assignor of plaintiff, was a witness upon the trial, and testified, in substance, that he acted as the attorney for defendant in the action of Meade v. County of Fresno, under an agreement by which he was to receive for such services what is known among lawyers as a "contingent fee." In the action referred to, there was involved, among other matters, a question as to the right of the defendant here to recover interest, amounting to about $1,800, upon his original demand against Fresno county, and the witness Grady stated the following as the contract between himself and defendant in relation to the compensation he was to receive as attorney for the latter in that action: "I says, if I recover this interest, it will more than pay my fee, and save you that much money. The interest would be about $1,800. I will charge you a thousand dollars out of that, and, if I don't recover it, I shall charge you ten per cent. of what I do recover; and, if I recover nothing, I will charge you nothing." And, referring to the amount of labor performed by him in that case, the witness further stated: "I think I gave it more attention considering that my fee was to be contingent, a good one, and depended entirely upon what I recovered." The defendant moved to strike out this testimony in relation to the contingent fee, upon the ground that there was no such issue in the case, the complaint alleging that plaintiff's assignor was to receive $1,000 for his services, without any reference to the result of the action in which they were rendered. The motion was denied by the court, and the court also instructed the jury to the effect that if they found "that it was agreed by and between the defendant and Grady that, in case said Grady recovered the full amount of said claim [referring to the claim of defendant against Fresno county], with interest thereon, then the defendant would pay him $1,000 and further find said Grady did in every respect fulfill the terms of the agreement on his part, and did recover, and the defendant did receive the full amount of said claim, with interest, then you must find for plaintiff in the sum of $950." In refusing defendant's motion to strike out the testimony in relation to the contingent fee, and in giving the instruction just quoted, the court erred. There is a fatal variance between the contract testified to by the witness Grady, and hypothetically stated to the jury in the charge of the court, and the contract alleged in the complaint. The contract alleged is that of an unconditional promise upon the part of defendant to pay to the assignor of plaintiff the sum of $1,000 for his services as an attorney in the prosecution of the action referred to in the complaint; while the evidence which the court held was relevant and sufficient, if believed, to warrant the jury in finding that the defendant made the alleged contract, was to the effect that the promise of defendant to pay was not unconditional, but contingent. There is a wide and essential difference between the two contracts, and proof of one will not support a finding that the other was made. The plaintiff's allegation of an absolute promise was not sustained by proof of the contingent promise, and evidence in relation to such contingent promise was not relevant to the issues made by the pleadings. Lower v. Winters, 7 Cow. 263. In the case just cited, it was said: "The contract proved is also essentially different from that declared on. The declaration states the promise on the part of the defendant to have been absolute and unconditional. The promise proved was to give $100 for the improvements, if he obtained a contract from the landlord. If he failed in obtaining a contract, he was not bound by his promise to the plaintiff. That was the express condition upon which it was made. It is true, the plaintiff proved upon the trial that the defendant had obtained a contract from Pierpont; but the fact of proving it shows its materiality, and that it ought to have been averred. The plaintiff has recovered on a contract entirely different from that on which he declared. The objection was taken below, and should have been sustained." The case of Lower v. Winters was decided under the common-law system of practice; but, as was said by Rhoades, J., in delivering the opinion of this court in Stout v. Coffin, 28 Cal. 65: "The rule that the probata must correspond with the allegata is not abrogated by the practice act. * * * The consequences of a variance between the averments in a pleading and the proof are the same under our system of practice as at common law, except that they may be to a great extent obviated by amendments to the pleadings, which are allowed with great liberality." As an instance of the strictness with which the rule requiring the proof to correspond with the allegations is enforced, the following cases may be cited:

Tomlinson v. Monroe, 41 Cal. 94; Johnson v. Moss, 45 Cal. 515; Clark v. Insurance Co., 36 Cal. 168; Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151.

2. The court also erred in permitting the witness Terry to give evidence in relation to the reasonableness of the contingent fee testified to by the witness Grady. There was no issue in the case as to the reasonableness of such a fee, and the admission of this evidence was clearly prejudicial to the defendant. See, upon this point, Ellis v. Woodburn, 89 Cal. 129, 26 Pac. 963.

3. The written assignment of the claim sued on omitted to name the plaintiff as the assignee, or to name any assignee, and parol evidence was admitted showing that such omission was unintentional, and that Grady in fact made an oral agreement assigning such claim to plaintiff, and that the writing produced at the trial was intended to effect such assignment. This evidence was objected to by defendant, but, we think, was properly admitted; and when the plaintiff offered to have the writing amended then and there by his assignor, so as to conform to the intention of the parties thereto, if the court had permitted such correction it is not perceived that any substantial right of the defendant would have been thereby affected.

We deem it unnecessary to pass upon the other points urged by appellant. Judgment and order reversed.

VAN LOO v. VAN AKEN et al. (No. 18,267.)

MORTGAGES—CONSTRUCTION—RIGHT TO FORECLOSE.

Defendants executed a note to plaintiff, stipulating that, on default in interest, compound interest was to be payable, and executed a mortgage to secure the payment of the note "at maturity," with interest according to the terms of the note. Held, that the mortgagee, for default in the interest, could not foreclose before the maturity of the note.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Kingsley Van Loo against Louise Van Aken and T. Van Aken to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Short, for appellant. S. J. Hinds, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. Action to foreclose a mortgage. A general demurrer to the complaint for want of facts was sustained by the superior court, and, plaintiff being unable to amend, judgment was entered for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals. The sole question to be determined is whether the complaint states a cause of action. It is alleged that on the 9th of December, 1890, the defendants executed and delivered to the plaintiff their promissory note in the following words and figures: "$5,000. Fresno, Cal., December 9, 1890. Five years after date, without grace, for value received, we promise to pay to Kingsley Van Loo, or order, in the city of Fresno, the sum of five thousand dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of eight per cent. per annum from date until paid. Both principal and interest payable in gold coin of the government of the United States. Said interest payable annually, and, if not so paid, the interest to draw interest the same as the principal; and, if this note is collected by suit, I agree and promise that the court having jurisdiction allow a reasonable attorney's fee, together with all legal expenses, to be made part of the judgment. Louise Van Aken. T. Van Aken." That at the same time the defendants executed a mortgage to secure the payment of said note according to its terms; that on March 31, 1893, the date of the commencement of the action, no part of the principal or interest of the note had been paid; that the mortgaged premises cannot be sold in portions without injury; that the defendants have violated their covenant to insure, and are insolvent, etc. It is claimed by appellant that on this state of facts, the sum of $800 being past due for interest, he had a right to commence his action to foreclose before the maturity of the note, notwithstanding the absence of any stipulation in the note or mortgage giving him that right. The decision of this court in Broadribb v. Tibbets, 58 Cal. 6, is directly opposed to this proposition; but appellant contends that the decision in that case is not law, and that it has been overruled in the later case of Yoakam v. White, 97 Cal. 286, 32 Pac. 238. It can scarcely be said that the latter case overrules the former, though it does disapprove it. In Broadribb v. Tibbets it was held that the mortgagee could not foreclose for interest in arrears, because there was no express agreement that he might do so, and certainly that decision was opposed to the current of authority and to the reasonable construction of our statute. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 726–728. But in this case there is something more than the mere absence of an express agreement that the mortgagee may foreclose upon default in the payment of interest. Not only does the note provide for compounding the interest if not paid as it falls due, which by itself is not a waiver of the right to enforce payment, but the language of the mortgage fairly warrants the conclusion that the intention of the parties was that it should not be foreclosed until the principal of the note was due. It is given not "to secure the payment of the note according to its terms," but "as security for the payment to the said mortgagee of the sum of five thousand dollars in gold coin of the United States of America, on the ninth day of December, A. D. 1895, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, according to the terms and conditions of a certain promissory note," etc. To say nothing of the fact that this contract was entered into at a time when the decision of Broadribb v. Tibbets declared the law of the state, and when, presumably, the parties looked to that decision for a construction of their agreement, it cannot be denied that, when a mortgagee is bargaining for the right to sell his debtor's land to satisfy his claim, any doubt that fairly arises upon the terms of the note and mortgage should be resolved against him. Here we think, that, with all the aid that they can derive from the statute, the note and mortgage leave it, at least, doubtful if it was not the intention of the parties that a compounding of the interest should be the only consequence of default in its payment, and that the mortgage should not be foreclosed prior to the 9th day of December, 1895. Therefore we hold that such was their intention. The other questions suggested in the brief of counsel for appellant have not been argued on either side, and we shall not undertake to decide them. Judgment affirmed.

HARPER v. ANDERSON et al. (No. 18,262.)

PARTNERSHIP—SUIT FOR ACCOUNTING—PARTIES—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTION ON APPEAL.

1. Where, in an action for a partnership accounting, books offered in evidence were objected to as not showng the transactions between the parties, the action of the trial court in rejecting the books will not be disturbed on appeal unless on the trial the party offering the books pointed out wherein they were relevant, and the record shows what he proposed to prove thereby.

2. One who buys out a retiring partner, and forms a partnership with the other member of the firm, is not a proper party to a suit by such member against the retiring partner for an accounting, the complaint alleging merely that he has funds of the new partnership in his hands, which were collected by the procurement of the retiring partner.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by J. H. Harper against C. M. Anderson and another for a partnership accounting. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. W. Elliott and A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Nicoll & Orr, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Plaintiff and defendant Anderson were copartners in the nursery business from May, 1888, to May, 1889, when defendant Anderson sold out to defendant Wheeler. The complaint charges that each of the defendants has collected and received moneys belonging to the firm of Harper & Anderson, of which one-half belongs to plaintiff, and prays for an accounting. Among other allegations, it is charged that defendant Wheeler has taken possession of the books, and for that reason plaintiff is unable to ascertain the amount collected or the amount due. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. At the close of plaintiff's evidence in chief a nonsuit was granted as to defendant Wheeler, and, upon the final submission of the case, findings were filed in favor of defendant Anderson, upon which judgment was entered. Plaintiff moved for a new trial on a statement, and now appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

The appeal from the judgment cannot be considered, because not taken in time.

The answer admitted the partnership between the plaintiff and Anderson, and its dissolution, but denied that the defendants had the books of the firm, or that any collections had been made of moneys belonging to the firm. There was no allegation that the business of the firm had been settled or adjusted, nor that there were no outstanding accounts at the time of the dissolution. The court, however, found that after the dissolution there was a settlement, and that Anderson paid plaintiff a certain sum of money, but that at the time of said settlement it was agreed that any sums of money which might thereafter be collected should belong to the plaintiff and Anderson, one-half to each. The evidence amply sustains the finding of these facts.

Certain books were produced upon the trial, but by whom does not appear. The plaintiff, when on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, was shown certain books, and testified as follows: "I recognize that book as my own book. I bought and paid for it. It was stolen out of my house. It is one belonging to Harper & Anderson, not Harper & Wheeler. This one we had at the nursery, and the other was down at Stockton. We were selling here. This book will show the amount of trees sold at the nursery. Both of these will show the number shipped down, and this book will show the number sold here. This, the number actually received. * * * I don't know how many trees were sold down here. The books will show." Plaintiff thereupon offered the books in evidence. The defendants objected on the ground that they showed the business between Harper and Wheeler, and were not the books referred to in the complaint. The objection was sustained, and plaintiff excepted. After additional statements by plaintiff in relation to the books, to the effect that one shows the sales at Stockton, and another the sales at Acampo, they were again offered in evidence, and again rejected; the last objection being placed upon the ground that "they show on their face that they do not show the transactions of Harper and Anderson." It must be presumed that the court made such inspection of the books as to satisfy it that the objection that they showed upon their face that they did not show the transactions of Harper and Anderson were true. If, notwithstanding their apparent irrelevancy, they in fact contained relevant and material evidence for the plaintiff, it was the duty of counsel to point it out, and offer to show the same by the books, and to insert in the record the fact so offered to be proven.

It is also urged that the court erred in granting the nonsuit as to Wheeler; that if he bought out Anderson he was bound to account to Harper for one-half of the collections; and that he testified that he had collected $2,200, no part of which had been paid to plaintiff. Wheeler testified that he took a bill of sale from Anderson, and we infer from one of the specifications of error that it was put in evidence, but it is not set out in the record, nor its substance stated, nor does it appear in any manner that he bought Anderson's interest in the accounts. There is also evidence tending to show that Wheeler purchased from Anderson at plaintiff's instance, and became plaintiff's partner in the business, and that the money so received was the money of the new firm, in which Anderson had no interest, and for which he was not liable. The complaint did not allege any indebtedness from Wheeler on account of the business of the new firm, nor even allege that he was in any way connected with the plaintiff in business; and the only liability alleged against him was for money belonging to Harper and Anderson, which it was charged he had collected by the procurement of Anderson. The nonsuit was therefore properly granted.

It is also urged that the court erred in admitting in evidence the bill of sale from Anderson to Harper. It is sufficient to say that the record does not set out the bill of sale, nor show that it was offered or received in evidence. The appeal from the judgment should be dismissed, and the order denying a new trial affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

LA POINT v. BOULWARE. (No. 18,279.)

INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS — TIME OF COMMENCEMENT—PREFERENCES—VALIDITY.

1. Under Insolvent Act, § 61, providing that "the filing of the petition by or against a debtor, upon which an order of adjudication in insolvency may be made, shall be deemed to be the commencement of proceedings in insolvency under this act," the petition must be sufficient in law to support an adjudication, in order that a transfer made within 30 days previous to the filing thereof shall be void under section 55.

2. The sustaining of a general demurrer to a petition in insolvency shows that the petition was not such that its filing would be deemed the commencement of proceedings in insolvency under Insolvent Act, § 61.

3. A transfer made by a debtor within 30 days before the filing of an insufficient petition in insolvency is not made void by the filing of a sufficient amended petition more than 30 days after the transfer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by Moses La Point, as assignee of T. M. Boulware, insolvent, against C. N. Boulware, to recover personal property alleged to have been transferred to defendant within 30 days before the commencement of insolvency proceedings. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Reardan & White, for appellant. John Gall, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by the assignee in insolvency of T. M. Boulware against the defendant, C. N. Boulware, to recover certain personal property alleged to have been transferred to the defendant by the insolvent in payment of a debt within 30 days before the commencement of insolvency proceedings. The sufficiency of the complaint in this action is assailed by appellant. The complaint here, however, cannot be distinguished from the complaint in La Point v. Blanchard (No. 18,241, filed March 12, 1894) 36 Pac. 98, which was held sufficient.

Appellant also contends that the petition under which T. M. Boulware was adjudged an insolvent was not filed within 30 days after the sale of the horses and wood to the defendant, and that therefore the sale in question does not come within the statute. The sale was made on or about the 1st day of September. A petition was filed by creditors on the 10th. On September 27th the court entered an order denying the petition. That order, we think, ended that petition. But on the 29th, and within the time allowed by the court therefor, an amended petition was filed. The so-called "amended petition" must be taken to be a new petition. The alleged insolvent appeared, and filed a general demurrer to the amended petition, and, as that petition was less than 30 days after the transaction, it was in time. But that demurrer was also sustained, and leave given to amend, and the amended petition, under which T. M. Boulware was adjudged an insolvent, was filed on the 28th of November. The findings show the foregoing facts. Appellant cites section 61 of the insolvent act, which reads as follows: "The filing of the petition by or against a debtor upon which an order of adjudication in insolvency may be made by the court shall be deemed to be the commencement of proceedings in insolvency under this act." It is contended that, if a petition is filed which is insufficient to justify an order adjudging the defendant an insolvent, a new or amended petition which is sufficient cannot take effect by relation as of the date of the original petition, but only from the date of the filing of the sufficient one. Section 405, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "Civil actions in the courts of this state are commenced by filing a complaint." The difference in language used in these two sections is suggestive. In the one last quoted, "filing a complaint" is the commencement of the action. If section 61 of the insolvent act were made to correspond to the above provision of the Code of Civil Procedure, it would read: "The filing of a petition against a debtor shall be deemed to be the commencement of proceedings in insolvency under this act." In this section, however, we have, instead of "a" petition, "the" petition "upon which an order of adjudication in insolvency may be made by the court." We think this language requires, as the commencement of the proceeding, the filing of a sufficient petition,—one upon which a valid adjudication of insolvency may be made. This would seem to be the natural construction and the plain import of the words. But, if reasons for such provision are required, they are at hand. Article 9, § 56, of this act imposes heavy penalties for a large number of acts done "after the commencement of proceedings in insolvency," which are not penal if done before. It would seem a hard construction that the filing of a petition upon which no adjudication could be made should be held to be the commencement of proceedings, and so subject the defendant to penalties, though no facts were alleged, or might ever be alleged, which would sustain an adjudication of insolvency. One of these penal offenses is "payment,"—an act which, under other circumstances, it is his duty to perform. Nor is the defendant in such proceedings the only person affected. Take this case. The defendant in this action (appellant here) indorsed a note for the insolvent, and, in consideration of the property sought to be recovered in this suit, assumed its payment. Under section 3432, Civ. Code, the transaction is expressly authorized. That section provides: "A debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another." And under the insolvent act such transactions are not disturbed unless they occur within one month before proceedings in insolvency are commenced. In such case the defendant here, who did only that which he had a right to do, and whose act cannot be assailed unless within the precise time limited by the insolvency act, should not be affected by the filing of an insufficient petition against the party with whom he lawfully dealt. If the filing of a petition against an alleged insolvent, upon which no adjudication of insolvency can be made, can have the effect of converting a lawful act into an unlawful one, and tie the hands of a business man, and prevent him from dealing with his property or paying his debts, it would open a wide door for persecution and the gratification of malice; a door that is effectually closed by the requirement that only the filing of a sufficient petition—one which, upon the facts alleged therein being established by proof, will sustain an order adjudging the defendant an insolvent debtor—shall be deemed the commencement of proceedings under the act.

Respondent calls attention to section 8 of the act, under which he contends the petitioners can amend their petition by leave of the court. The language of the section in that regard is as follows: "The petitioners may from time to time amend and correct the petition, so that the same shall conform to the facts, by leave of the court before which the proceedings are pending." Respondent also calls attention to the language of section 55, which, so far as material, is as follows: "If any person, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, within one month before the filing of a petition by or against him," etc. Counsel italicizes the words "a petition." The remainder of the section shows that an adjudication of insolvency and the appointment of an assignee are required before the penalty can be visited upon the person to whom the property is transferred, and therefore contemplates a sufficient petition. But this section should be so construed as to harmonize with the other provisions of the act. Section 61 makes the filing of a sufficient petition the commencement of the proceedings, and section 56 punishes certain acts done "after the commencement of proceedings in insolvency," while the construction of section 55, contended for, would make the filing of any petition, though it should not be "the commencement of proceedings," to be an act wholly changing the essential character of a transaction from a lawful to an unlawful one.

Respondent further contends that sustaining a demurrer does not necessarily show that an adjudication could not have been had under the petition demurred to. This would be so if the record here were silent as to the grounds of the demurrer. But in this case the record shows that the demurrer was a general one, which implies that the petition was attacked upon the ground that it failed to state facts which would sustain an adjudication that the debtor was an insolvent under the provisions of the act.

We therefore conclude that the proceedings were not commenced within one month after the sale of the property in question to appellant, and that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the action at the cost of the plaintiff.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

BENNETT et al. v. MORRIS et al. (No. 18,323.)

Diversion of Water — Action between Mine Owners—Evidence—Examination of Witness—Record of Deed—Absence of Stamps.

1. The question whether a pleading is ambiguous and uncertain cannot be raised by a general demurrer.

2. The fact that the record of a deed executed in 1872 does not show that any United States revenue stamps were placed thereon does not render such record incompetent evidence.

3. In an action for damages for the diversion of water, where a witness has testified only as to the condition of ditches and flumes, and the work required to clear them, and not as to the amount of the damage, the action of the trial court in striking out an answer of the witness, "Yes, sir, I have," given in response to a question by defendant's counsel as to whether the witness has stated all the damages, is within its discretion.

4. In an action for the diversion of water from a mine, a witness who testifies that he knows the claims and ditches involved; that he has been over the ditches and at the mines of both plaintiff and defendant; that he has resided in the vicinity 12 or 13 years, and is a miner by occupation, having been engaged mostly in hydraulic mining,—is qualified to give his opinion as to whether it is practicable for plaintiff to run his mine if defendant continues to run his in the same way as before.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by W. P. Bennett and others against George Morris and others to restrain the diversion of water, and for damages caused by such diversion. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jas. F. Farraher and R. S. Taylor, for appellants. Gillis & Tapscott, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to restrain the diversion of water, and for damages. By the judgment the plaintiffs were awarded an injunction and damages in the sum of $250. The defendants appeal from the judgment and an order denying their motion for a new trial. In support of the appeal it is claimed that several errors of law were committed which call for a reversal. These alleged errors will be noticed in their order.

1. The demurrer to the first cause of action set up in the complaint was general, and it was not error to overrule it. The words objected to, as showing that no cause of action was stated, must be read in connection with the balance of the count; and, when so read, the most that can be said is that they make the pleading ambiguous and uncertain. But that is an objection that cannot be raised by a general demurrer.

2. The plaintiffs offered and were permitted to read in evidence the record of the deed from Timothy Haley to Andrew Bahr, dated October 18, 1872, and also the conveyance indorsed thereon from Bahr to George McNeal, dated February 14, 1873. The Haley deed appears to have been signed by the grantor's mark, and witnessed as required by section 14 of the Civil Code, and it was proved that diligent search had been made for the original papers, and that they could not be found; that the copies found in the record were substantially correct; and that under the said deeds the grantee, McNeal, entered into possession of the property, and held such possession until he transferred it to other parties in June, 1878. For the purposes for which the plaintiffs sought to use these deeds, it was therefore immaterial whether they were properly recorded or not. And it was also immaterial that it did not appear that any United States revenue stamp was placed thereon. Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 240; Thomasson v. Wood, 42 Cal. 416.

3. The point is made in appellants' brief that the court erred in admitting in evidence the deed from George McNeal to E. L. Shumway and brother, but no argument is made in support of this position. The point is clearly untenable. McNeal testified to buying the property from Bahr, and that he remained in possession of it and used the ditch and water every mining season up to 1878, when he deeded the property to the Shumways; and Edwin L. Shumway testified that he and his brother got the property from McNeal, and remained in possession of it jointly for 12 years, when they conveyed it to the plaintiffs. The deed was therefore clearly admissible, in connection with the other proofs offered, to show that the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had been in possession of the property in question, and claimed to own it, for more than 20 years before the action was commenced.

4. The plaintiffs' witness Knackstedt was asked on cross-examination by counsel for defendants if he had stated all the damages that had been done to plaintiffs' claim, and answered, "Yes, sir, I have." The answer was stricken out on motion, and in this we see no prejudicial error. The witness did not attempt, in his direct or cross examination, to estimate the amount of damage done. He testified as to the condition of the ditches and flumes at different times, and the work required to clean them out; and, as to all the facts stated by him, counsel were in no way restricted in their cross-examination. The court evidently considered the question and answer objected to as improper, under the circumstances, and its action was clearly within the limits of its discretion.

5. During the direct examination of plaintiffs' witness McLaughlin, he was asked whether it was practicable for the plaintiffs to run their mine if the defendants continued to run theirs in the manner they had been running it during the last mining season. The question was objected to on the ground that the witness had not shown himself competent or qualified to answer it. The objection was properly overruled. The witness had testified that he knew the parties to the action, and the claims and ditches involved; that he was over the ditches in 1892, and had been at the mines of both plaintiffs and defendants; that he had resided in the vicinity for 12 or 13 years, and was a miner by occupation, having been engaged mostly in hydraulic mining. This was a sufficient showing that the witness was qualified to give the opinion asked for.

6. The plaintiffs' witness Edward L. Shumway was asked on his direct examination what it would cost to clean out their lower ditch; that is, clean out the débris that is there now. The question was objected to upon the ground that plaintiffs had not shown that this débris was run into the ditch by any act of defendants, or that they were responsible therefor. The objection was overruled, and, as we think, properly. It was clearly shown that the débris which filled up the "lower ditch" came down from defendants' mine, and there was no pretense that it came from any other source.

7. The only other questions discussed by counsel relate to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, and the form of the judgment. It would subserve no useful purpose to state the evidence. It covers about 60 pages of the transcript, and is in some respects conflicting. A careful reading of it, however, shows that it is amply sufficient to justify each of the findings complained of.

The judgment does not require any modification. It properly restrains the defendants from using any of the waters of the stream, except at such times and in such manner as they can do so without materially deteriorating the quality of the water for mining purposes on plaintiffs' claim, or diminishing the quantity of water flowing into plaintiffs' ditches to less than 1,000 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure; and, so long as defendants comply with those conditions, plaintiffs will have nothing to complain of. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

O'ROURKE v. VENNEKOHL et al. (No. 15,542.)

INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. Where, on the question of the effect of a false statement by a witness, the court charges that "a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others," a judgment will not be reversed because of a refusal to present the question more in detail, though the instruction asked for would, if given, have been proper.

2. In an action for personal injuries the refusal to grant a new trial because of newly-discovered evidence will not be disturbed on appeal where the new evidence is that of but one witness, who, like several who testified at the trial, witnessed the accident.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Margaret O'Rourke against Bernard Vennekohl and others for personal injuries. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. C. Van Ness, for appellants. Stafford & Stafford, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Action for damages for personal injuries. Verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and from the judgment and order denying a motion for new trial the defendants appeal.

1. The court refused the following instruction requested by defendants: "If you shall find that the plaintiff has willfully misstated any fact concerning which she has been interrogated, then her testimony in other respects should be distrusted, and the jury may in such case disregard the whole of her evidence. So, also, if you shall find that any witness examined upon behalf of the plaintiff has willfully misstated any fact concerning which he has been interrogated, then the testimony of such witness in other respects should be distrusted, and the jury may in such case disregard the whole of the evidence of such witness. Where a witness gives willfully false testimony, the jury should treat all his testimony with distrust and suspicion, and reject all, unless convinced, notwithstanding the base character of the witness, that he has in other particulars sworn to the truth,"—but instead charged the jury on this point that "a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others." While we think the instruction as requested was proper, and should have been given, nevertheless we are unable to hold that there was error in the action of the court. In refusing the instruction as asked, the court charged the jury upon the point in the language of the statute, and this, it has been repeatedly held, was sufficient. People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 238, 10 Pac. 502, and cases there cited.

2. After a careful examination of the record, we are unable to say that the court erred in denying the motion for a new trial. The motion was based upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The granting of a new trial upon this ground is largely matter of discretion, an exercise of which will not be disturbed by this court except in case of abuse clearly disclosed by the record. It should not be granted in any case where the party has not shown due diligence in discovering and producing the evidence, nor where the evidence is purely cumulative, nor unless the newly-discovered evidence is such as to render a different result upon a retrial probable. Testing the showing made in this case by these rules, we certainly cannot say that there was any abuse of discretion in denying the motion. The new evidence was largely, if not entirely, cumulative, and conceding that appellants' view of the law be correct, that a new trial should not be refused merely because the evidence is cumulative, in a case where the cumulation is sufficiently strong to render a different result probable, we cannot say that the record presents such a case. The new evidence is that of but one witness, who, like several who testified at the trial, witnessed the accident. What the probable result of his evdence, if produced before the jury, would be, when viewed in connection with all the other evidence in the case, was a question which the lower court, with all the witnesses and facts of the case before it, was much more competent to determine than this court can possibly be. We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

MERLEY et al. v. BOULON et al. (No. 15,630.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL.

A notice of appeal stating that the appeal is from an "order" denying a motion for a new trial, and from an "order" denying a motion to set aside the judgment, a description of which is given, and "from the whole thereof," is insufficient as to notice of appeal from the "judgment."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; J. C. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by one Merley and others against one Boulon and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Dismissed.

Smith & Murasky, for appellants. Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The notice of appeal herein is addressed to the attorneys for respondents, and is in the following words: "You will please take notice that the plaintiff substituted in the above-entitled action hereby appeals to the supreme court of the state of California from the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and from an order of said court denying plaintiff's motion to set aside the decision and judgment in the action, which said judgment was therein entered in the said superior court on the 16th day of December, 1891, in favor of the defendants in said action and against plaintiffs, and from the whole thereof." The appeal from the orders named in this notice was dismissed by this court, February 6, 1893; and the appellant now claims that the notice above set out is sufficient as a notice of appeal from the judgment therein described, and he insists upon his right to be heard upon such appeal. This contention cannot be sustained. The notice of appeal is certainly very awkwardly constructed, but is not ambiguous, and it cannot possibly be construed as an appeal from the judgment therein mentioned. It says nothing about an appeal from the judgment, but gives notice only that the plaintiff "appeals to the supreme court * * * from the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and from an order of said court denying plaintiff's motion to set aside the decision and judgment in the action;" and then follows a description of the judgment to which the said motion of plaintiff related; and the notice then concludes with the words "and from the whole thereof." These latter words refer to the orders previously mentioned, and indicate that the appeal is from the whole and not a part of said orders.

While notices of appeal should be liberally construed, and no appeal should be dismissed because of any misdescription of the judgment or order to which it relates, unless it appears that the respondent has been misled by such misdescription, still this rule is not liberal enough to justify us in holding that the above notice of appeal is or was intended as an appeal from a judgment. In order to constitute such a notice, the paper relied on for that purpose should at least state that the appeal is taken from a judgment; and this, considering the fact that it is not difficult to find words to properly express such an intention, is not a harsh rule. It follows from these views that the cause is not properly on our calendar, the only appeal in the case having already been disposed of; and for this reason the submission thereof is set aside, and the cause stricken from the calendar. So ordered.

FLECKENSTEIN v. PLACER COUNTY. (No. 18,298.)

COUNTY GOVERNMENT ACT—FEES OF CONSTABLES—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF PROVISIONS.

1. St. 1893, p. 452, § 184, subd. 17, which declares that subdivision 14 of the act (fixing the fees of constables) shall apply to present incumbents, applies to a constable of Placer county holding office at the time of the passage of the act.

2. St. 1893, p. 452, § 184, subd. 14, providing that the fees allowed constables for services in criminal actions other than felonies shall not exceed $75 for any one quarter, is not in conflict with Const. art. 11, § 5, which makes it the duty of the legislature to regulate the fees of officers in proportion to their duties.

3. Nor does such provision conflict with Const. art. 4, § 25, prohibiting local and special legislation affecting the fees of any officer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by one Fleckenstein against the county of Placer to recover constable's fees. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for less than the amount claimed by him, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. K. Robinson and F. P. Tuttle, for appellant. L. L. Chamberlain, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This action was brought by the appellant, a constable within the county of Placer, to recover from that county fees for services rendered by him as constable in criminal cases other than felonies. The amount demanded in the complaint is the sum of $573.10, with interest from July 1, 1893. A judgment was rendered in the superior court in favor of plaintiff, but not for the full amount claimed. The plaintiff appeals. It is conceded by appellant that the judgment is in accordance with subdivision 14 of section 184 of the county government act approved March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 452), and that the judgment must be affirmed if that provision of the act is constitutional, and applies to constables in office in the county of Placer at the date of its passage.

1. Subdivision 17 of section 184 of the act above mentioned declares that "the provisions of subdivision 14 of this section shall apply to present incumbents." This language clearly refers to those holding the office of constable in that county at the date of the passage of the act. It can mean nothing less, and its effect is not destroyed by the fact that the main body of the act of which section 184 is a part does not, except as in the act "otherwise provided," take effect until the first Monday after the 1st day in January, 1895. It is the intention of the act that subdivision 14 of section 184 should take effect immediately upon its approval.

2. Subdivision 14 of said section 184 is not unconstitutional. It provides that constables shall have the "fees allowed by the general fee bill of 1870, provided that the amount allowed by the board of supervisors for services in criminal actions and proceedings other than felonies shall not exceed seventy-five dollars for any one quarter." This provision is not in conflict with section 5 of article 11 of the constitution of this state, which makes it the duty of the legislature, among other things, to regulate the fees of officers "in proportion to their duties." Green v. County of Fresno, 95 Cal. 329, 30 Pac. 544. Nor is the law under consideration local and special, and for that reason forbidden by the constitution.[1] Longan v. County of Solano, 65 Cal. 122, 3 Pac. 463; Cody v. Murphey, 89 Cal. 522, 26 Pac. 1081.

The other points urged by counsel as grounds for a reversal of the judgment do not require special discussion. Judgment affirmed.

SCHAEFFER v. HOFMANN. (No. 15,382.)

QUIETING TITLE—CONTEST BETWEEN VENDOR AND VENDEE—FORM OF DECREE—COSTS ON APPEAL.

1. In an action to quiet title to lands, where no mortgage lien is claimed, and where the answer pleads possession under a contract of sale, and offers payment of the amount due, a judgment declaring the amount due to be a mortgage on the land will be reversed as not warranted by the pleadings.

2. Plaintiff, by a verbal contract with defendant, agreed to convey certain lands to him within five years on the payment of a certain sum. Defendant went into possession, and made improvements. Held, in an action to quiet title, that equity would require plaintiff to convey on payment of the amount due within a specified time, in default of which his title would be quieted.

3. Costs on appeal from two improper judgments which, if enforced, would have cast heavy expense on the appellant, are properly chargeable to respondent.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Action by Caspar Schaeffer against Conrad Hofmann to quiet title to land. There was a personal judgment for plaintiff for a specific sum, and a final judgment making such sum a mortgage lien on the land. Said Hofmann having died, Ida Hofmann, his administratrix, was substituted as defendant, and she appeals. Reversed.

F. E. Johnson, for appellant. H. M. Barstow, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to quiet the title of plaintiff, and to procure him to be restored to possession of a tract of land containing about 10 acres, situate in Pope valley, county of Napa. Defendant answered, denying the allegations of plaintiff as to his right to possession of the premises; admitted that he (the said defendant) was in possession; and by way of cross complaint set out that on the 5th day of September, 1884, plaintiff and defendant entered into a verbal agreement by which plaintiff agreed to sell to him the land upon the payment by defendant to him of $150, with interest at 8 per cent., within five years, to convey the same to defendant, etc.; defendant was to take possession of the land at once, and retain the same until payment and conveyance; that defendant entered into possession, cleared the land, fenced it, erected a house and planted a vineyard and orchard thereon, etc.;

that defendant has always been ready and willing, and is now anxious, to pay the purchase money, and offers to pay the same into court, and asks that plaintiff be decreed to execute a deed, etc. Plaintiff answered the cross complaint, claiming, in substance, that the consideration to be paid by the defendant for the land was $650, with interest, $100 of which he admitted had been paid. The cause was tried by the court, and written findings waived. An interlocutory decree was entered, decreeing the defendant to be entitled to a deed of the land from plaintiff upon payment of the sum of money due as purchase money and interest, and referring the question of the amount due to the court commissioner to take testimony and report. The court commissioner reported the sum of $594.28 due plaintiff from defendant. Thereupon, on the 30th day of January, 1893, an ordinary common-law judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and against defendant, for said sum of $594.28. Thereafter, on the 13th day of February, 1893, a decree was duly filed, but which decree purports to have been signed January 30, 1893. By this decree, omitting the formal parts, it was decreed that the sum of $594.28 due plaintiff was secured by a lien upon the land, and constituted a valid mortgage thereon, and which mortgage was ordered foreclosed, and the property sold, etc., as in ordinary cases of foreclosure sale. Defendant departed this life, and the administratrix of his estate, having been substituted as a party defendant, appeals from both judgments.

The cause comes up on the judgment roll. It is conceded by both parties that the personal judgment was improperly entered, and hence should be reversed, annulled, and set aside. As to the final decree the position of appellant is (1) that the first judgment was final, and, although not warranted by the pleadings, was valid upon its face, and no other or further judgment could be entered while it remained in force; (2) that the final decree entered February 13, 1893, holding the demand of plaintiff to be a valid and subsisting mortgage, and foreclosing the same, was not warranted by the pleadings.

It may be remarked that plaintiff, in his complaint, asked that his title be quieted. The defendant averred a contract for the purchase of the property by him, and averred a willingness to pay. Plaintiff admitted this, and practically the only difference between them was as to the amount due as purchase money. Under these circumstances, we agree with what is said by appellant in the opening brief, viz.: "The court should have directed the respondent to execute the necessary conveyance upon receiving the purchase money within a limited time, and, if appellant's intestate should fail to make payment within that time, then the respondent's title be quieted, and we have possession. There would have been some equity in this kind of a judgment." We may add that there would have been complete equity in such a decree. Counsel for respondent replies: "I agree with appellant that the proper judgment to have been entered is one directing the payment by the appellant within a given period, say thirty days, of the amount found due from him, and, in default of such payment, that respondent's title be quieted."

Counsel for respondent claims that the judgment as rendered was more favorable to appellant than that to which her intestate was entitled, and hence that the costs of the appeal should be assessed against her. There were two improper judgments rendered against appellant's intestate. Upon the first of them an execution might have been levied upon, and enforced against, the property of the judgment debtor. Upon the other, the expenses of a sale would have been cast upon the property of the estate represented by the appellant; or, if she paid the demand, she would have been left without the muniment of title to which, on such payment, she was entitled. It was her right to avoid these disadvantages, and it could only be done by an appeal, the costs of which should not be visited upon appellant. Appellant in her reply brief urges that a new trial should be granted because of the improper allowance of some item of interest. It cannot be said from the judgment roll that there is any just ground for this contention.

The personal judgment of January 30, 1893, appealed from should be reversed, set aside, and annulled. The final decree of foreclosure, filed February 13, 1893, appealed from, should be reversed, and the court below directed to enter a decree requiring the respondent to execute a proper deed of conveyance to appellant as administratrix of the estate of Conrad Hofmann, deceased, of the property in dispute, upon the payment to him by appellant of the sum of $594.28, with interest thereon from July 29, 1891, at 7 per cent. per annum, within 60 days from the entry of such decree, and, if the appellant shall fail for 60 days to make such payment, that then and in that event the title of respondent to said land and premises be quieted, and that he be restored to the possession thereof.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the personal judgment of January 30, 1893, appealed from, is reversed, set aside, and annulled. The final decree of foreclosure filed February 13, 1893, appealed from, is reversed, and the court below directed to enter a decree requiring the respondent to execute a proper deed of conveyance to appellant as administratrix of the estate of Conrad Hofmann, deceased, of the property in dispute, upon the payment to him by appellant of the sum of $594.28, with interest thereon from July 29, 1891, at 7 per cent. per annum, within 60 days from the entry of such decree, and, if the appellant shall fail for 60 days to make such payment, that then and in that event the title of respondent to said land and premises be quieted, and that he be restored to the possession thereof.

MALVILLE v. KAPPELER. (No. 15,570.)

SERVICES OF ATTORNEY—EMPLOYMENT BY EXECUTOR—INDIVIDUAL LIABILITY—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action to recover attorney's fees for services rendered in an action in which defendant was named as defendant both individually and as executrix, though not a necessary party thereto, it appeared that she made no claim in such prior action in her individual capacity, and she testified that she employed plaintiff merely as attorney for the estate, but this plaintiff denied. The property received by defendant in settlement of the prior action was applied to the benefit of the estate of which she was executrix, and plaintiff received an allowance from the estate for his services, under order of court. Held, that a finding that plaintiff was not employed by defendant in her individual capacity was proper.

2. In such an action the inventory filed by the executrix, who was the wife of the testator, would not determine whether certain premises were separate or community property, and was therefore inadmissible for that purpose.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by one Malville against one Kappeler. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. B. Malville, for appellant. L. J. Hardy, Jr., for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The appellant is not entitled to recover from the respondent for his services, unless they were rendered at her request. This issue is directly presented by the pleadings, and the testimony thereon was contradictory; the plaintiff testifying that he was retained by her as her attorney in the action in which the services were rendered, and the defendant testifying that she never employed him, except as the attorney for the estate of her husband, of which she was executrix, and that for these services he had been fully paid. The finding of the court is in accordance with the testimony of the defendant, and upon this appeal must be accepted as conclusive. It may be added that the testimony of the defendant is corroborated by the circumstances under which the services were rendered. The suit was to foreclose a mortgage upon property belonging to the estate of the deceased husband of the defendant, made by him in his lifetime, and the only interest of the defendant in the property was such as she had under the will. Although she was named as a defendant individually, as well as in her representative capacity, she was not a necessary party defendant in the foreclosure suit, and in the answer which was prepared by the plaintiff no claim was made on her behalf, except as the executrix of the will. All the property that was received in the settlement of the suit was received for and applied to the benefit of the estate of which the defendant was executrix. For the services thus rendered by the plaintiff he was allowed by the probate court the sum of $1,500, and the court below finds that this was for all the services rendered by him in the action.

The inventory in the estate would not, for the purposes of this action, determine whether the mortgaged premises were separate or community property, and, when offered for that purpose, was properly refused by the court. The judgment and order are affirmed.

SANTA CRUZ ROCK PAVEMENT CO. v. BOWIE et al. (No. 15,616.)

NEW TRIAL—SURPRISE—FORECLOSURE OF ASSESSMENT LIEN—RIGHT TO JURY.

1. The fact that a party is misled by erroneous advice of his counsel as to the admissibility of evidence is not "surprise" for which a new trial will be granted.

2. In an action in equity to foreclose the lien of an assessment for street improvements, defendant is not entitled to a jury trial, as the action is not on a contract made by him, or which imposes a personal liability on him.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by the Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Company against one Bowie and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. T. Rogers, for appellants. Parker & Eells, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Assuming that, in an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment, it is competent for the defendant to show that the work contracted for has not been done, or that the specifications for the work have been manifestly disregarded (McVerry v. Kidwell, 63 Cal. 246), such a defense must not only be alleged in the answer, but must also be supported by evidence at the trial. If the court refuses to hear any evidence in support thereof, or disregards it in its decision, exception should be taken to its rulings, in order to have the same considered upon a motion for a new trial. Upon the hearing of such motion, any errors in law occurring at the trial must be presented in a bill of exceptions or statement of the case (Code Civ. Proc. § 658), and cannot be considered if presented merely in ex parte affidavits containing the evidence which was presented at the trial, and the rulings thereon.

After the trial in the present action, the defendants gave notice of their intention to move for a new trial upon the grounds of surprise and errors in law occurring at the trial, stating that the motion as to the surprise would be made upon affidavits. In their notice of intention they also specified certain particulars in which they claimed that the court erred at the trial. Subsequently, affidavits were filed on their behalf, setting forth matters which would have constituted evidence in support of their defense of nonperformance of the contract according to its terms, but which, if admissible at all, should have been offered at the trial. There is no statement or bill of exceptions in the record, and it does not appear whether this evidence was offered at the trial, unless it is to be inferred from a statement in the affidavit of the defendant Bowie that he was not prepared, at the trial, to present the matters embodied in his affidavit, for the reason that he was surprised at a ruling of the court contrary to what his attorneys had previously advised him. Erroneous views of the law, or advice of an attorney contrary to the ruling of the court, is not, however, the "surprise" for which a new trial will be granted. Klockenbaum v. Pierson, 22 Cal. 160.

The court did not err in refusing the demand for a jury trial. The action is in equity for the foreclosure of the lien of an assessment, and is not upon any contract made by the defendant (Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 75), or upon which there is any personal liability against the defendant (Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241). In such an action, neither the constitution nor the statute requires the submission of the issues to a jury. Code Civ. Proc. § 592; Cassidy v. Sullivan, 64 Cal. 266, 28 Pac. 234.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WAGNER v. WAGNER. (No. 18,179.)

DIVORCE—WILLFUL NEGLECT—RES JUDICATA.

A judgment in favor of the husband in an action by the wife for a divorce, under Civ. Code, § 105, making willful neglect of the husband to provide his wife with common necessaries a ground for divorce if such neglect continues for one year, is not a bar to a subsequent action, based on his continued neglect to support her for a year, occurring after the entry of such judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action for a divorce by Helena Wagner against John Wagner, upon grounds of desertion, neglect, and cruelty. Plaintiff prevailed in the court below, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. J. H. McKune, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, by this action, seeks a divorce from her husband, upon the grounds of desertion, neglect, and cruelty. Each of these grounds is alleged in the complaint as a separate count or cause of action. In the first count plaintiff alleges that the defendant deserted her June 8, 1881, and has without cause and against her will continued his desertion since that date. In the second count she alleges that since the 8th day of June, 1881, the defendant has willfully neglected to provide for her the common necessaries of life, although he has had the ability so to do. Upon the allegations of cruelty the court found in favor of the defendant, and this finding is not challenged by either party. The complaint is unverified, and the defendant pleaded a general denial; and, as affirmative defenses, that, at the commencement of the action, there was another suit pending between the parties upon the same cause of action; and, also that in another action between them, for the same cause of action, a judgment had been rendered in favor of the defendant prior to the commencement of the present action. The court found that the defendant deserted and abandoned the plaintiff on the 1st day of June, 1889; and that since that date he had continued his desertion and abandonment; and also that since said date the defendant had willfully neglected to provide for the plaintiff the common necessaries of life, although he had had the ability so to do. These findings are amply sustained by the evidence. Upon the issue of neglect the plaintiff testified as follows: "Defendant has done nothing towards my support in the last two years. I have not seen him except here in court, at the trial of the last case. Defendant, since June 8, 1881, has not contributed to my support anything. When my child was born, in December, 1881, he came out to see me; and I asked him to give me fifty cents to buy some medicine with, and he refused. He has never had a home since for me to go to. As he went away when my child was born, he asked me when I was coming back to live with him. I told him I would go when he had a home for me. He said that had nothing to do with it, and he has never advised me he had a home for me. * * * At a former trial defendant did, while on the stand, say, in answer to his attorney, that he wanted me to come back to him, but he did not say he had any place for me. He never had any place for me, and never offered to provide a home for me." It is true that the defendant testified at the present trial: "I offer now in good faith to take her back, and provide for her." But the court was at liberty to determine whether such statement was in reality made in good faith, and was not bound to accept his statement as conclusive.

Upon the special defenses set up in the answer, the court found that there was no action pending between the parties at the commencement of the present action; that the judgment relied upon by the defendant as a bar was rendered in an action commenced on the 1st day of June, 1889, for causes of action existing at that time; and that said judgment was a bar to all of the acts mentioned in the complaint herein occurring before the commencement of that action, but was not a bar as against any subsequent desertion and neglect. The facts constituting these special defenses are the following: In 1887 the plaintiff commenced an action for divorce against the defendant, in the county of Yolo, upon the grounds of desertion and neglect, in which she alleged that, during all the time since their marriage, he had willfully neglected and refused to provide her with the common necessaries of life, although he had the ability so to do; and that on the 8th day of June, 1881, he deserted her, and had ever since lived separate and apart from her. Issues were joined upon these averments, and on May 13, 1889, judgment was entered in his favor. June 1, 1889, the plaintiff commenced another action for divorce against the defendant, in the county of Sacramento, upon the same grounds, alleging in her complaint that the defendant willfully deserted her more than two years before the commencement of that action; and that, for more than five years prior to the commencement of the action, he had neglected to provide for her the common necessaries of life, although he was abundantly able to do so. Upon issues joined on these averments, the superior court of Sacramento county rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant, which was entered October 24, 1889. The present action was commenced January 21, 1891.

Civ. Code, § 105, makes the willful neglect of the husband to provide for his wife the common necessaries of life, when he has the ability so to do, a ground for divorce, if such neglect continues for one year. A judgment in favor of the husband, in an action by the wife for a divorce upon this ground, could not in the nature of things be a bar to her right to assert as a ground of divorce his continued neglect to support her for a year, occurring after the entry of such judgment. The support of his wife is a continuing obligation on the part of the husband, and his failure to meet this obligation is a continuing cause for a divorce, unless it appears to the court that there has been an unreasonable lapse of time before the action is commenced (Civ. Code, § 124); and the husband is not released from this obligation by a judgment in his favor in an action for a divorce upon this ground. If, after such judgment, he continues to disregard this obligation for the period required by the statute as a ground for a divorce, the former judgment cannot avail him as a defense. The law does not fix the amount of income which the husband must receive in order to impose upon him the obligation of supporting his wife, nor does it attempt to designate what are the common necessaries of life. These matters vary with the varying circumstances of the parties to the marriage, and it is left to the discretion of the judge in each case to determine whether the husband's income, as well as the relation between him and his wife, are such as to impose upon him the obligation of providing for her wants; but when a husband is in constant employment, for which he receives the ordinary wages of his labor, and refuses or neglects for years to make any provision for the wants of his wife, a court is justified in finding him guilty of willful neglect. Hardy v. Hardy, 97 Cal. 125, 31 Pac. 906, has no application to the present case. That was an action brought by the wife under section 137, Civ. Code, to recover permanent support from her husband. Her right to maintain the action depended upon the fact of his desertion, without any regard to the time of its continuance. It was held that a former judgment in his favor, in an action for permanent support, based upon a specific act of desertion, was a bar to a second action based upon the same act of desertion.

Certain rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence are assigned as errors, but, as these rulings were with reference to evidence upon the issue of cruelty, they need not be considered. The testimony of Parish related to the defendant's neglect prior to the commencement of the former action. As the court found that this neglect was barred by the judgment in that case, it could have had no weight in determining its decision. As the order of the court must be affirmed upon the foregoing grounds, it is unnecessary to determine whether the former judgments in favor of the defendant are a bar to the plaintiff's right to a divorce upon the ground of his desertion. The order is affirmed.

(LAWRENCE, Intervener. No. 18,257.)

SPECIAL FINDINGS — CONTROLLING CHARACTER — PLEADING—UNCERTAINTY — DESIGNATION OF INSTRUMENT—LIEN OF MORTGAGE.

1. If a discrepancy exists between the general finding and the more specific findings of particular facts, the latter must control.

2. Where an instrument which is in legal effect a mortgage, and not a deed of trust, is set out in full in the complaint, the fact that it is there designated a "trust deed so being and operating as a mortgage" does not create an ambiguity in the pleading.

3. A mortgage given to secure advances up to a certain sum, if duly recorded, takes precedence of a subsequent attachment, to the extent of any balance due on such advances up to said sum.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Oroville against George H. Lawrence and Nellie L. Lawrence. W. J. Lawrence intervened. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants and intervener appeal. Reversed.

John Gale, for appellants. Harris & Lloyd, for respondent. Reardan & White, for intervener.

VAN FLEET, J. This action was brought to foreclose an instrument in the nature of a mortgage given by defendants on certain real and personal property to secure the repayment of advances, which, by its terms, plaintiff was to make to the defendant George H. Lawrence, by paying his overdrafts to the amount of $1,800. The complaint alleges the making of advances in the aggregate of $4,449.76, the repayment of $3,278.86, and a balance due plaintiff of $1,218.90, with interest in the sum of $47.65. A demurrer by defendants was overruled, and they answered, admitting the making of the mortgage, but denying that there was any indebtedness due. There was an intervention by one W. J. Lawrence, claiming a prior lien on the mortgaged property by virtue of an attachment levied in a suit against the defendant George H. Lawrence. The court found in favor of plaintiff in the amount claimed, and in favor of the right of the intervener to a prior lien upon the personal property, but postponing his lien upon the realty to that of the plaintiff, and a decree was entered accordingly. The defendants appeal from the judgment, and the intervener from so much thereof as postpones his lien upon the real property. The appeals are based upon the findings alone.

From a mass of probative facts found, it appears in substance that the defendant George H. Lawrence, who was a butcher in the town of Oroville, desiring to buy a band of beef cattle which were for sale, and being without ready money to make the purchase, applied to the plaintiff bank. The price of the cattle was $1,600, and the bank agreed, in consideration of the making of the mortgage in suit, to furnish the money to pay for the cattle, and to advance Lawrence $200 besides, making in all the sum of $1,800; the arrangement being that the bank should take the bill of sale of the cattle in its own name, and hold it as additional security for its advances. The mortgage was accordingly executed, and on the same day that it was delivered, February 17, 1893, Lawrence drew his check on the bank for $1,800, which was honored by the bank, giving to the agent having charge of the cattle its draft for $1,600, and taking the bill of sale, and paying to Lawrence $200 in cash. For some reason, however, which does not clearly appear, the agent was unable to make delivery of the cattle, the sale fell through, and the $1,600 draft was returned to the bank on February 20th, without having been negotiated or cashed. On February 23d, Lawrence paid into the bank $100, and subsequently, to adopt the language of the finding, "on the 25th of said month of February the plaintiff, recognizing that defendant George H. Lawrence had received no benefit through the attempted purchase of said band of cattle, honored his overdrafts under the terms of said trust deed or mortgage to the extent of four hundred and sixty-five and eleven hundredths dollars ($465.11) and in like manner, on the 27th day of said month, advanced the further sum of three hundred and ninety-five dollars ($395), and in like manner, on the 1st day of the following month of March, the further sum of $32.15. That on the 3d day of said month of March the defendant deposited with plaintiff the further sum of one hundred and forty dollars ($140), thus leaving him indebted to the bank, upon a simple money basis, in the sum of eight hundred and fifty-two and twenty-six hundredths ($852.26), saying nothing of interest." On the 4th of March the parties were informed that the beef cattle for which they had negotiated could be purchased, and upon the promise of Lawrence that he would repay plaintiff the $852.26 already advanced, by the 6th of March, plaintiff advanced and paid the $1,600 for the cattle; taking the bill of sale in its own name, and the cattle into its possession, as originally agreed. Lawrence did not, however, pay the $852.26 as promised, and plaintiff then required him to pay in cash for the cattle at the rate of $30 per head, as he received them from plaintiff's possession, and on these terms the cattle were eventually delivered to and slaughtered by Lawrence. It is further found that on May 27th the plaintiff advanced and paid for Lawrence the sum of $95.80 to discharge certain attachment claims against the mortgaged property. The above facts, with others of an immaterial character, are all found in finding 5. It is then found, in finding 6, "that, in view of all the deposits and payments made by said George H. Lawrence, the balance of the account on the 29th day of May, 1893 (the date of the commencement of this action), stood in favor of plaintiff and against said defendant in the sum of one thousand two hundred and eighteen and ninety hundredths dollars ($1,218.90) principal, besides the sum of ($46.05) forty-six and five hundredths dollars interest, at the rate of one per cent. per month as provided in said trust deed, and that the same was long overdue and payable from said defendant George H. Lawrence to plaintiff, by virtue of the terms of said overdrafts or checks, and as well also by virtue of said demand for payment of date of March 7, 1893."

The main question presented is whether the findings support the judgment, and we think it manifest that they do not. Under the issues raised the ultimate facts to be found were as to the amount of the indebtedness, if any, and whether the same was due. It is true that the court, in finding 6, finds the balance of the account to be $1,218.90 in plaintiff's favor, with certain interest, and that by the terms of the overdrafts the same was due; but it is perfectly evident that this finding is merely a conclusion drawn from the antecedent specific facts found in finding 5, and it will be as readily seen that these facts do not sustain the conclusion, either as to the amount of the balance standing in plaintiff's favor, or as to the fact of its being due. These findings being inconsistent, we must look to the specific facts rather than the general conclusion to find support for the judgment, upon the well-settled principle that if a discrepancy exists betwen a general finding and the more specific findings of particular facts the latter must control. Looking at finding 5, it is apparent that the lower court was under a misapprehension of the effect of the transaction in including, as one of the advances made by plaintiff, the $1,600 draft or bill of exchange given February 17th. The sale of the cattle having fallen through at that time, and the draft having been returned to the bank and never paid, it did not constitute an advance under the mortgage, since the sum was never in fact withdrawn from the funds of the bank. This, then, left but the $200 paid to Lawrence as the amount actually advanced on February 17th. Subsequently other advances were made, which gave a balance on March 3d of $852.26 owing plaintiff; these advances being clearly within the terms of the mortgage, because less in amount than $1,800. On March 4th the plaintiff advanced and paid the $1,600 for the cattle. This advance, in excess of the security afforded by the mortgage, was made partly in consideration of the promise by Lawrence to pay back within two days the balance of $852.26 then standing against him. This, however, he did not do, and thereupon the plaintiff required Lawrence to pay for the cattle as he got them. Right here the finding is indefinite and obscure on the point as to whether Lawrence received any of the cattle without paying for them. It is possible he may have done so before the plaintiff made the requirement that he pay cash. If he did pay for them all at the rate of $30 per head, he must have paid back all and a little more than their purchase price, since there were 55 head in the lot. If the fact is that there remained any unpaid portion of the sum advanced for the cattle, it should be distinctly found, in order to strike a correct balance. As the findings leave the account, the most that can be found against the defendant is the item of $852.26, due March 3d, and the $95.80 advanced May 27th to discharge attachments, making $948.06. There is no way that we can discover, under the facts found, by which the balance arrived at by the court can be figured out. Nor is there any sufficient finding as to the balance due when the action was commenced. Here, again, the specific facts found do not support the conclusion stated in finding 6. As to the $852.26, the promise of Lawrence to repay that amount on March 6th was for a good consideration, and that sum became due at that date. But there is nothing whatever in the findings to show any understanding or agreement, as required in the mortgage, as to when the $1,600, or any part of it, or the item of $95.80 subsequently advanced, should be repaid; and as the $852.26 cannot be traced into the final balance struck, the judgment cannot be supported, because there is nothing to show that that balance was due when the action was commenced. There being no basis, in view of the uncertainty of the findings, for a modification of the judgment, the case will have to be sent back for a new trial.

There is no other point requiring extended notice. The demurrer of defendants to plaintiff's complaint was properly overruled. The instrument sued on, while having the form of a deed, and purporting in terms to convey the title to the property, shows upon its face that it was intended as, and in legal effect is, a mortgage, and not a deed of trust. Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 256. Being set out in full in the complaint, the fact that the pleader designates it as a "trust deed so being and operating as a mortgage" does not create an ambiguity or uncertainty in the pleading, since its character is to be determined from its terms. The allegation "that all said advances made by way of payment of said overdrafts were by the terms thereof, and so became immediately due and payable," is not a conclusion of law, but is, while awkwardly expressed, a sufficient allegation of the ultimate fact. The statement published by the plaintiff corporation was substantially sufficient to bring it within the law, and the court did not err in so holding. Nor did the court err, under the facts found, in postponing the lien of the intervener to that of the plaintiff upon the real estate. While the plaintiff never acquired a lien upon the personalty by virtue of his mortgage, he did upon the realty; and, the attachment of the intervener having been levied subsequently to the recordation of the mortgage, the lien of the latter took priority, to the extent of any balance found due plaintiff up to $1,800, since the fair construction to be put upon the terms of the mortgage is that it was a continuing security for any balance of advances or overdrafts not exceeding $1,800. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

BLACK v. SHARKEY. (No. 18,202.)

DELIVERY OF DEED—EVIDENCE OF INTENTION.

1. Though there is no allegation of fraud, accident, or mistake in the answer, parol evidence is admissible to show that the deed on which plaintiff relies, and which named him as grantee, was not in reality delivered, though it was handed to him by the grantor.

2. In an action of ejectment, it appeared that, 13 years previously, plaintiff's uncle handed him a deed of the land, which stated a money consideration, but that the uncle remained in exclusive possession and paid the taxes for 10 years, until his death, as did his administrator up to the time of trial, and that plaintiff, as county assessor, for four years, took his uncle's affidavit that he owned the property, and did not include it in his own inventory of assets under the insolvent act, but stated in conversation that his uncle turned over the land to him for a time to avoid trouble. While he had the deed, plaintiff gave the patent to the land to his uncle, telling him at the time that he had destroyed the deed, and advised him not to give defendant a deed of the land, and later expressed regret when his uncle's will, in defendant's favor, was declared void, saying that the land ought to go to defendant. Plaintiff testified that he failed to assert ownership because the deed was lost for a number of years, and he did not wish to make a claim without ability to produce a deed, and that he recorded the deed when he found it, but did not notify defendant for several months, though he knew that the administrator had commenced proceedings to sell the land. Held, that a finding that the instrument was not intended to operate as a deed was proper.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Thomas Black against Miles Sharkey. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. O. Hundley and Goodwin & Goodwin, for appellant. C. E. McLaughlin, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action of ejectment in which the judgment was in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. The complaint is in the most general form, alleging plaintiff's ownership and right of possession, and an ouster and withholding of possession by defendant; and the answer is a specific denial of all allegations of the complaint, except as to the withholding of possession. James Sharkey, uncle of defendant, was the owner of the demanded premises on May 13, 1878; and plaintiff claims title under him by a deed of conveyance of that date, which purports to be an absolute bargain and sale deed, in consideration of $600, the payment of which is acknowledged in the deed. The evidence satisfactorily shows that the deed was signed, acknowledged, and placed in the custody or possession of plaintiff by James Sharkey at or about the time of its date, where it remained until the commencement of this action,—a period of 13 years. James Sharkey continued to reside on the land described in the deed until December 15, 1888, when he died; and defendant, as administrator of James Sharkey, has been in possession ever since. The plaintiff never had actual possession of the land, and never received any rent or profit therefrom. On the trial the defendant contended that the deed was never delivered to plaintiff in the sense required by law to give it effect as a conveyance of the land, for the reason that neither party ever intended that it should have such effect; and the trial court sustained this view.

1. Counsel for appellant contend that, inasmuch as there is no allegation of fraud, accident, or mistake in the answer, no evidence dehors the deed was admissible to prove the intention with which the deed was placed in the custody or possession of plaintiff, and especially not admissible to prove that the parties did not intend that the deed should take effect according to its terms. While it is true that the possession of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence that such deed was delivered by the grantor with intent that it should take effect according to its terms, yet such possession is not conclusive evidence of a valid delivery; and "it may be shown by parol evidence that a deed in the possession of the grantee was not delivered." Devl. Deeds, §§ 294, 295, and authorities there cited. "And even if the deed is deposited with the grantee, but for a purpose other than delivery, it would not take effect as a deed; nor can a title be derived from a deed which has not been delivered. While, therefore, it is not competent to control a deed by parol evidence where it has taken effect by delivery, it is always competent by such evidence to show that the deed, though in the grantee's hands, has never been delivered." Washb. Real Prop. p. 311. And it is also well settled that a deed which has always remained in the hands of the grantor may be shown to have been duly delivered. Says Mr. Devlin (section 269): "Actual manual delivery and change of possession are not required in order to constitute an effectual delivery; but whether there has been a valid delivery or not must be decided by determining what was the intention of the grantor, and by regarding the particular circumstances of the case." In the case of Hastings v. Vaughn, 5 Cal. 316, it was said: "Delivery is a qestion of fact, depending more upon intention than upon the mode of fulfilling the intention." In Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 4 Pac. 473, and 8 Pac. 46, it was said: "The act, solemn and authentic, done in writing in form apt for the conveyance of land, with signature and seal, does not take effect as a deed until delivery with intent that it shall operate. * * * The intent with which it is delivered is all important. This restricts or enlarges the effect of the instrument." To the same effect is the case of Denis v. Velati, 96 Cal. 223, 31 Pac. 1. In all these cases extrinsic parol evidence was admitted to prove the intent. As strong cases to the same effect in other states, see Stewart v. Stewart, 50 Wis. 445, 7 N. W. 369; Knolls v. Barnhart, 71 N. Y. 474. I think, therefore, that the court did not err in admitting extrinsic evidence tending to prove that the deed was neither delivered by defendant nor accepted by plaintiff with the intent that it should take effect as a conveyance of the land.

2. Counsel for appellant contend that, even if the evidence was admissible, it was insufficient to justify the finding of the court. It must be conceded, not only that the burden of proof was upon the defendant, but that, to sustain it, the proof on his part must have been strong and satisfactorily convincing; and it seems to have been so, though mostly circumstantial. (a) As above stated, the plaintiff was never in possession of the land, and never received any rents or profits during the 13 years between the date of the deed and the commencement of this action. (b) James Sharkey remained in the exclusive possession, claiming to be owner, until he died,—a period of 10 years,—and during this period paid all the taxes; and his administrator has been in possession and has paid all the taxes ever since. (c) During four years of the period that James Sharkey was in possession, the plaintiff was assessor of the county of Plumas, in which the land is situate, and, as such assessor, officially and personally assessed the land for each year of its term of office, to James Sharkey, as owner, and, prior to each assessment, administered to Sharkey the oath, required by law, that the list of property (including the land in question) assessed to him was correct; the written description of the land in each list being in the undisputed handwriting of the plaintiff. On the occasion of one of these assessments, Sharkey complained to him that his valuation of the land was too high, to which plaintiff answered that he did not think so. (d) On July 12, 1886, plaintiff filed in the superior court of Plumas county his voluntary petition as an insolvent debtor, and annexed thereto an inventory purporting to contain an accurate description of all his estate, both real and personal. This inventory was verified by his oath, as required by the insolvent act; but it contained no description of nor reference to the land in question. (e) O. McElroy testified, in substance, that, about 13 or 14 years before the trial, he had a conversation with plaintiff, in which plaintiff told him that Sharkey was getting old and childish, and imagined that he might have trouble about his land, and for that reason "turned the land over to plaintiff for a time;" but said nothing about a deed. (f) Defendant testified that in 1882, in his presence, plaintiff handed to James Sharkey the United States patent for the land, saying, "Here, Uncle Jimmy, is your patent;" that Sharkey asked plaintiff, "What ever became of that deed?" and plaintiff answered that "he destroyed it;" and it was admitted that the patent was in Sharkey's possession at the time of his death. Defendant further testified that in 1884 plaintiff told him "to take care of the old man, and, when the old man would die, he would leave me his property;" that in 1884 or 1885 James Sharkey proposed to deed the land to defendant, and they went to plaintiff's store to have plaintiff draw the deed, but he would not draw the deed, and advised James Sharkey not to make such a deed, for the reason that, if he did, defendant "could kick him out any time," but said nothing about his deed for the property, or his claim to be the owner of it; that in 1888, after the death of James Sharkey, plaintiff advised defendant to settle up the estate, and let it in his own name, and accompanied defendant to the county seat for the purpose of assisting him to that end. (g) It appears that James Sharkey had attempted to make a will giving his property to defendant, and, when plaintiff and defendant went to the county seat for the purpose of commencing proceedings to settle the estate, they called on Mr. McLaughlin, defendant's attorney herein, for advice. As to what was said by plaintiff on that occasion Mr. McLaughlin testified as follows: "On the 28th of December, 1888, Miles Sharkey and Thomas Black, the plaintiff and defendant in this action, came to my office, and presented to me a document purporting to be the last will and testament of James Sharkey. I told them it was not a will in law. When I told them it was not a will, Mr. Black said to me: 'It is too bad. Uncle Jimmy always intended that land should go to Miles. What will be the result if this is not a will?' I said, after the payment of the debts and costs of administration, it must be distributed among the heirs of James Sharkey. He said: 'That is too bad, too bad. I am sorry there was a mistake. The land should belong to Miles Sharkey.' When it came to filling in the petition for letters of administration, Miles Sharkey said nothing. When it came to a description of the real estate, Mr. Black said: 'Well, there is Uncle Jimmy's homestead in Sierra valley. I can't give you the numbers, but you will find them in the assessment roll of 1888.'" (h) There was the testimony of two other witnesses tending in a slight degree to impeach the character of the plaintiff for truth and veracity, but his own testimony, in connection with undisputed facts and circumstances, was more damaging. The only evidence on the part of the plaintiff in rebuttal, except his own testimony, was the testimony of James Collins as to plaintiff's character. By his own testimony, he neither denied nor attempted to explain the evidence for the defense showing his assessment of the land to plaintiff as owner, nor that showing that he did not include the land in his insolvency inventory, nor did he deny any part of the testimony of Mr. McLaughlin, but he simply denied all the material testimony of the defendant. Upon being asked why he did not set up his ownership of the land at the time McLaughlin pronounced James Sharkey's will invalid, he answered: "There was several years that that deed was lost. If I had gone to work and said I owned that land by a deed, and could not produce it, it would have been like many other blunders. They would have laughed at me. Therefore I said nothing in regard to it because of the loss. It was not recorded. Very soon after, I found it, and got it recorded." He further testified that the deed had been lost seven years before he found it; that his little child found it in his woodshed; but that he did not notify the defendant or lay any claim to the land until three or four months after he found the deed, though he knew, before he found it, that proceedings for an administrator's sale of the land had been commenced and were pending in the probate court.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

BAXTER v. HART. (No. 19,425.)

PARTIES PLAINTIFF—TRANSFER OF INTEREST—PLEADING—WAIVER OF DEFECT.

1. Where one of the parties jointly interested in a contract for threshing grain agrees that the other shall receive all of the benefits thereunder, the latter, being the real party in interest, is the only proper party plaintiff in an action thereon.

2. The objection that one of the joint obligees in a contract, in an action thereon by himself alone, failed to set out in his complaint, the agreement by which he acquired the other party's interest, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal, evidence of such agreement having been admitted below.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by J. L. Baxter against Moses Hart. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Patten & Graham and R. J. Ashe, for appellant. Robinson & Haralson, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to recover $391.93 for services performed by plaintiff in threshing wheat and barley for defendant. The complaint was not verified, and the answer was a general denial of its allegations. The cause was tried by the court, written findings filed, and judgment rendered thereon as prayed for in the complaint. The appeal is from the final judgment, was taken within 60 days after rendition of judgment, and is supported by a bill of exceptions. The testimony was conflicting. There was testimony tending to show the following state of facts: Plaintiff and one Flanigan owned a threshing machine, and were engaged as partners in threshing grain for farmers. Said Flanigan and defendant were also partners in the crop of grain threshed. Flanigan arranged with defendant for the threshing, and each of them was to pay separately for one-half of the threshing. Plaintiff and Flanigan then agreed that they would not thresh the crop as copartners, but that the pay coming from defendant should all go to plaintiff, and that Flanigan's grain should be threshed for him free to offset the other half. It did not appear that this arrangement between plaintiffs was known to defendant until after the grain was threshed. There was no plea of a nonjoinder of parties, and no objections to testimony.

The only question in the case is, does this testimony support the finding that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $391.93 for the threshing of defendant's crop of wheat and barley, etc.? No reason is perceived why plaintiff and Flanigan could not, as between themselves, although copartners, agree that, as to a given venture or contract, plaintiff should have the entire benefit, as they might have assigned the demand arising therefrom one to the other after completion of such venture or contract. Had defendant presented a counterclaim against the firm held by him before notice of this arrangement, it would have been valid to defeat the claim; but, in the absence of such a cross demand, it is not perceived that he can be injured by a judgment for that which he was bound to pay. The case, then, stands thus: Plaintiff and Flanigan entered into a contract jointly with defendant, and then, by an agreement between themselves, stipulated that plaintiff should be the recipient of the entire benefit thereof. This constituted him the real party in interest as between himself and his copartner, and, as a result, he was the proper and only proper party plaintiff. In pleading the facts, however, the joint contract and the special agreement between plaintiff and Flanigan whereby the former became the owner of the claim should have been set out. It was omitted, and defendant might have objected at the trial to the introduction of the evidence of the joint contract and the agreement between plaintiff and his copartner. This was not done; and, the evidence having shown the right of plaintiff to recover, it is now, on appeal, too late to raise the objection for the first time. Had the objection been made at or before the trial, it could have been obviated by an amendment of the complaint. By not being taken, it was waived. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

JACOBS v. ELLIOTT, County Clerk. (No. 18,265.)

JURORS' FEES—ATTENDANCE ON COURT.

Under St. 1871–72, p. 188, § 1, amending Act 1870, § 28, and providing that jurors shall receive a certain sum per diem for "attendance" upon court, a juror is not entitled to fees for the time during which he is dismissed from attendance on the court before his final discharge.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; J. K. Law, Judge.

Mandamus by A. Jacobs against J. G. Elliott, county clerk. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James F. Peck, for appellant. B. F. Fowler, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is a proceeding under a writ of mandate sued out by appellant to command respondent, as county clerk of the county of Merced, to issue to him, the said appellant, a certificate showing and certifying to his attendance in and upon the superior court in and for said county of Merced as a trial juror, and that he is entitled to pay for 51 days, and to like pay for one mile travel as such juror. The cause was submitted upon the petition, answer, and agreed statement, upon which the court below found in favor of respondent, and entered judgment discharging an alternative writ of mandate theretofore issued in the cause, and awarding costs against the appellant. The appeal is from the judgment discharging the writ.

The petitioner was in all respects competent to serve as a trial juror in the county of Merced, and was regularly drawn, summoned, and on the 23d day of March, 1891, appeared as a juror in the superior court in and for said county of Merced, and served as such juror for three days, viz. until and including March 25, 1891. On said last-mentioned day, petitioner and other jurors in attendance on said court as jurors were, by order of the court, duly entered, excused from attendance; and by subsequent like orders, of all of which petitioner was duly notified, he was excused from and did not attend as or serve as a juror until May 19, 1891, when he duly appeared and served for two days, at the end of which time he was finally discharged. The question to be determined is this: Was petitioner, under the law, entitled to pay for the 51 days intervening between his first appearance and his final discharge, or only for the 5 days of his actual service?

The superior courts of the several counties of the state are required in the month of January in each year to make an order designating the estimated number of trial jurors required for the transaction of the business of the court and the trial of causes therein for the ensuing year; and thereupon the supervisors are required to select a list of persons competent to serve, as required by the court, and place the same in the possession of the county clerk, who shall place the names upon separate pieces of paper, fold and place them in a box to be called the "trial jury box." "The persons whose names are so returned shall be known as regular jurors, and shall serve for one year, and until other persons are selected and returned." Code Civ. Proc. §§ 204–211. The following sections of the same Code provide that, when the business of the superior court requires the attendance of a trial jury, it shall require it to be drawn and summoned to attend the court at a time to be designated. These provisions of the Code are full and explicit as to the mode of selecting, drawing, and securing the attendance of jurors for the superior court, but make no provision for their compensation. Their pay is regulated in most if not all of the counties of the state by the act of 1872. St. 1871–72, p. 188. By the first section of that act, which amends section 28 of the act of 1870, it is provided as follows: "Grand and trial jurors shall receive two dollars per day for attendance upon a court of record," etc., provided that in certain counties, of which Merced is one, "grand and trial jurors shall receive three dollars per day." From the foregoing provisions it will be observed: (1) That persons become and "shall be known as regular jurors" by being selected and having their names deposited in the designated manner in the designated receptacle. (2) They become entitled to the fixed compensation only when their names are drawn therefrom, and they are summoned and attend upon a court of record. The compensation comes, not by virtue of the quasi office, but at so much per diem for attendance on the court. Jurors are subject to the orders of the court. It designates the time when their attendance shall commence, and its duration. It may excuse them for cause, and may discharge the whole panel at will. Having general authority to command the presence of the jury, and by virtue of sundry statutes as well as by that inherent authority which comes from the common law and attaches to courts of record, it is not doubted but that the superior court may, in furtherance of the public interest, dismiss from attendance upon it for a limited and specified time the jurors in attendance, without finally discharging them from their duties; and, as their compensation is only given for attendance, they are not entitled, when so excused, to the per diem fixed by the statute. As the clerk of the superior court did not refuse to the appellant the certificate for five days' attendance and the mileage to which it was conceded he was entitled, the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

HOMICIDE—TRIAL—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. When arraigned, defendant is not entitled to have read to him a list of the witnesses examined.

2. In a trial for murder, where evidence has been given to show ill will between defendant and deceased and threats of the former against the latter, it is not error to call the attention of the jury to such evidence, where the evident purpose is to warn them against giving much importance to the same.

3. In a trial for murder, after stating that, where the killing by defendant is shown, the burden is upon him of proving circumstances which would mitigate the same, a charge that it was not necessary that defendant prove affirmatively that he did not intend such consequences, if there exists a reasonable doubt that he is guilty, is not erroneous where the court further charges that "the commission of homicide by defendant, if proved, does not cast on him the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or excuse by a preponderance of evidence."

4. In a trial for the murder of a wife by her husband, it appeared that, a few minutes before the killing, their daughter left them in their house, eating at a table; that, on her return, defendant was trying to lift deceased from the floor, and that she died immediately; that defendant's explanation was that he and deceased had an altercation, and that a butcher knife which he threw on the table glanced therefrom, and struck the deceased; that the relation between husband and wife had been unpleasant; that the knife entered the abdomen of deceased, making an incision nine inches long, the entire length of the blade. Held, that a conviction would not be set aside.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

James M. Neary was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Bart Burke, Charles B. Younger, and Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant. Carl E. L. Lindsay, Dist. Atty., Wm. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Charles H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. Appellant was charged by information with the murder of his wife, Catherine Neary, and was convicted of murder in the second degree. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. Appellant objected to being required to plead upon the ground that he had not been arraigned, because there was not read to him at the time of his alleged arraignment a list of witnesses. Assuming that the point sought to be presented can be raised upon such an objection without moving to set aside the information, still, as there is no requirement that the names of witnesses shall be indorsed upon an information, section 943, Pen. Code, applying only to indictments, the "list of witnesses" mentioned in section 988 can apply only to an arraignment in a case where there has been an indictment. See People v. Sherman (Cal.) 32 Pac. 879.

2. The court did not err in denying appellant's challenge to the panel on the alleged ground of the disqualification of the officer who summoned the jurors. Waiving all other questions, the evidence on the point was not of such a character as to give us warrant to declare that the court erred in holding it insufficient to establish the disqualification of the officer.

3. The court did not err in overruling appellant's objection to the testimony of the coroner as to a certain statement made to him by appellant touching the cause of his wife's death. In the first place, the statement was not a confession, and therefore not subject to the rule that a confession must first be shown to have been made freely and voluntarily, etc.; and, in the second place, it was the same statement that was made to several other persons, and does seem to have been made freely and voluntarily.

4. We see no prejudicial error committed by the court in giving or refusing instructions to the jury. The court had the right to tell the jury that there had been evidence offered "tending" to show ill will between appellant and deceased, and threats by the former against the latter, for there certainly was some evidence that had that tendency. Moreover, the court made the statement clearly for the purpose of warning the jury against attaching much importance to such evidence, and immediately proceeded to impress that warning in language that occupies nearly two pages of the printed transcript. Evidently, appellant was not prejudiced by this part of the court's charge. We do not think that the part of the charge pointed out in point 5 of appellant's original points and authorities can be construed as telling the jury that appellant could be convicted solely upon his own admissions. Appellant objects to a certain part of the charge in which the word "demonstrate" is used. This part of the charge was also intended to be and was favorable to the appellant. The court, having stated the rule laid down in section 1105, Pen. Code, that, the commission of the homicide by appellant being shown, the burden was upon him of proving circumstances which would mitigate, justify, or excuse, used this language: "But you will observe in this connection that the burden of proof thus cast upon defendant is not used in any literal sense. It is not necessary that defendant shall in this matter, any more than in any other, prove affirmatively that he did not intend such consequences. It is sufficient that he demonstrate to your understanding, by testimony given, by inferences correctly and properly drawn from the whole testimony in the case, that, notwithstanding the burden so cast upon him, there still exists in your mind a reasonable doubt of his guilt. In the trial of every criminal case, the law, at the outset, clothes the defendant with the presumption of innocence until his guilt is proven beyond a reasonable doubt; and this presumption attaches at every stage of the case and to every fact essential to a conviction." Moreover, at the request of appellant, the court gave other instructions upon this subject, and, among others, the following: "The commission of homicide by the defendant, if proved, does not cast on him the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or excuse by a preponderance of evidence. If the evidence introduced, either on the part of the prosecution or the defense, creates in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to whether the act was justifiable or excusable, or whether it was caused accidentally or feloniously, you should acquit the defendant." These instructions, notwithstanding the unhappy use of the word "demonstrate," state the law upon the point involved as favorably to appellant as could be reasonably expected, and go fully as far as People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. 127, 549. We see no errors in the refusal of the few instructions asked by appellant which were refused. They were covered by the many instructions given. Neither were there any errors in the few amendments made by the court to the instructions asked. The court gave more than 30 instructions asked by appellant, and the charge of the court of its own motion was quite lengthy; and all the instructions, taken together, stated the law, not only fairly, but most favorably to appellant.

5. The only serious question in the case is whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict, or, rather, whether it should be held here that the court below erred in not granting a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. At the time the deceased received the wound which caused her death, there was no one present other than the deceased and the appellant. A few moments before it occurred, their little daughter had left them seated at a small table in a room of their house, at which they were eating, and had gone out to the well for some water. When she returned, she saw the deceased lying on the floor, and the appellant was taking her up. She died immediately. Neighbors soon came in, and the explanation of his wife's death which the appellant then gave, and which he always afterwards gave to others (he did not testify at the trial), was, substantially, that the deceased and himself had been out together somewhere, and had just returned home, and sat down to the table to eat supper; that a little altercation had taken place between them; that they had contradicted each other about some matters of difference; that he said, "That is not so," and threw a butcher knife which he had in his hand upon the table; and that the knife got out of his hand, and glanced or bounded from the table, and struck the deceased, making the wound which caused her death. It was amply shown that his character was good. The relations between him and the deceased had not been pleasant, although the trend of the testimony was to the point that she was of an unamiable and irritable disposition, and did most of the quarreling; he generally remaining silent when she found fault with him, at least when in the presence of others. However, he complained to a friend of the difficulty he had in getting along with her. It is contended strenuously by counsel for appellant that the evidence was not inconsistent with the theory of his innocence, and that, therefore, he should have been acquitted. But there were many things to be considered by the jury in determining whether or not his account of the homicide was true. His story, though not entirely impossible, was not probable. The knife, which entered the abdomen, made an incision into the person of the deceased 9 inches long,—the entire length of the blade of the knife. It passed through the skin, through fatty tissue from 1½ to 2 inches thick, through the muscles of the abdomen, and through the intestines, to the muscles of the back. Nothing appears in the record as to the sharpness of the knife, but the jury saw it. The character and direction of the wound, the relative positions of the parties when last seen, the disposition made of the knife after the occurrence, the prior feelings of the parties towards each other, the appearance and manner of the witnesses,—these and many other things, which cannot be pictured here as they were in the trial court, were legitimate matters to be considered by the jury in coming to their conclusion. Moreover, weight must be given to the denial of a new trial by the judge of the trial court, not only because he had the advantage of observing the witnesses and seeing the whole trial but because it is his province and duty to pass, in the first instance, upon questions involving the sufficiency of evidence. After carefully examining the whole case, and giving due weight to every consideration urged by counsel for appellant, we do not feel it our duty to disturb the denial of a new trial by the court below. Judgment and order affirmed.

TOON v. HUBERTY. (No. 18,299.)

MARRIAGE—CONSENT WITHOUT SOLEMNIZATION.

Civ. Code, § 55, provides that mere consent, without solemnization or a mutual assumption of marital rights and duties, does not constitute a valid marriage. Civ. Code, § 75, provides for the signing and recording of a declaration of marriage by all persons married without a solemnization. Held, that such declaration does not constitute a valid marriage, in the absence of a mutual assumption of marital rights and duties.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. Gottschalk, Judge.

Action by Charles T. Toon against Mary Huberty, alias Mary Toon, to determine the validity of their marriage. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Snyder & Snyder and Colin Campbell, for appellant. Paul C. Morf, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action to obtain a decree adjudging and declaring that the plaintiff and defendant never were and are not husband and wife, and for the cancellation of a declaration of marriage. The defendant made default, and the court made and entered its judgment and decree in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. From this decree the defendant appeals, and the only question to be determined is whether the complaint makes a case for the relief granted. Appellant contends that the facts alleged in the complaint constitute a valid marriage. It appears that the parties united in a declaration of marriage, conforming in all respects to the requirements of section 75 of the Civil Code,[1] which was duly witnessed, acknowledged, and recorded; but, prior to and at the time of making said declaration, it was expressly and mutually agreed by the parties that they should never assume any marital rights, duties, or obligations, and should not cohabit as husband and wife, but should live separate and apart from each other, and they have ever since lived separate and apart and independent of each other.

Consent alone does not constitute marriage; it must be followed by solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations. Civ. Code, § 55. It is conceded that in this case there was never any assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations, but appellant contends that the signing, acknowledging, and recording of the declaration of marriage was solemnization. The statute will not, in our opinion, bear this construction. Civ. Code, §§ 68–79. On the facts alleged and found, there was no marriage. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

PEOPLE v. LANG. (No. 21,119.)

CRIMINAL TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS — ASSUMING FALSITY OF DEFENDANT'S TESTIMONY.

1. On a trial for burglary, where defendant testified that he spent the day on which the crime was committed at the house of a certain person, and that he fixed the date from the fact that he and such person were thrown out of a buggy, and the person referred to testified that the buggy accident did not occur on the day of the burglary, but that on the day of the burglary the defendant was at his house "off and on, but, being busy, he could not say how long or when," and the defendant afterwards admitted that he was mistaken as to the day of the buggy accident, it was error for the court in its charge to assume that the defendant was not at the house of such person the whole of the day of the burglary.

2. In a criminal trial, in commenting on the evidence of the defendant, it is error for the court to charge that: "In looking at his testimony, you must remember it is the testimony of an accused man. Of course, he has a powerful motive to swear himself out of this charge. We all understand that. And while you are not to disbelieve him merely because he is in that situation, still you will not shut your eyes to the fact that he has that motive, and you will govern yourselves accordingly; that is to say, you will look at his testimony by the light of that fact. You may believe it after all. * * * The law invites your attention to the motives of the witnesses."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Robert Lang was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Reversed.

John T. Cary, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and sentenced to the state prison for a term of five years. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Several points are made for a reversal of the judgment, mostly based upon objections to the charge of the court.

1. The evidence of the prosecution tended to show that the burglary with which defendant was charged was committed by entering a dwelling house at 419 Baker street, in the city of San Francisco, on the 11th day of June, 1893, between the hours of 11 a. m. and 5 p. m. The defendant's main defense was an alibi. He testified that he did not commit the burglary; that he did not enter the house; was never near it in his life. He said: "I remember Sunday, the 11th of June last. I was at Mr. Carr's place. He keeps a saloon at the end of the Sutter street road, right at the corner. I went there between 8 and 9 o'clock Sunday morning, June 11th, and remained there until Monday about 12 o'clock. About 9 o'clock Sunday evening Mr. Carr asked me to come down town with him. He had a trotting horse. We went down town, and they were building a line at the time at Fifth and Mission, and the rails at this time were about this high [showing] above the pavement, and in going over it the buggy broke down. We had to leave the buggy, and go to a livery stable and hire another buggy, and put the horse in it, to go home with. That was on Sunday, June 11th, and that is the reason I remember the day." Mr. Carr, called as a witness on behalf of defendant, testified in substance as follows: "I live at the corner of Sutter and Central avenue. I am acquainted with the defendant. He was at my house the day the buggy broke down. The stable man says it was the 13th of June (Tuesday), this year. I have no means of knowing or telling the day of the week except by what the stable man says. I am sure it was not on Sunday. It was a week day. The day the buggy broke down he was out there, and wanted me to go on a bond for a friend of his. It was about two o'clock in the afternoon that we went down town in the buggy. The buggy broke down at Fourth street. It was not on Sunday the buggy broke down. He was out there two or three days before that. He was out there the Sunday before that. He was out there for two or three days before the day the buggy broke down. He was there Sunday, the 11th of June. I think he was there Saturday, Sunday, and Monday. I can't say how long he stayed, it is so long ago. Maybe an hour or two. He was there off and on. I was busy. Sunday is a busy day out there." Afterwards the defendant admitted that he was mistaken as to the day the buggy broke down. This was all the testimony introduced on the question of alibi. In this state of the evidence the court, in its charge to the jury, said: "Now, as to the matter of testimony, as I remarked to you before, the value of the testimony is entirely with you. You are the judges of that, but I will remind you that a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others; that is to say, a witness willfully false. Now, defendant took the stand, and he undertook to state that on the particular Sunday involved he was with a particular person the whole of the day. It turns out, it seems, that that was not so. Now, do you believe that he was willfully false in making that statement? It is said upon his part (and that is a matter to be considered) that as a matter of fact he was with this witness Carr, but he was simply mistaken as to the particular day; that he was honest in his statement. Of course, if you think he was, it would not come under this rule that I have read to you." It is urged, and we think justly so, that by this language the learned judge of the court below violated section 19 of article 6 of the constitution of the state, which provides "that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact." The court virtually tells the jury that the statement of the defendant that he was at the witness Carr's house during the whole of the time he testified he was, on Sunday, June 11th, was not true, but was false, and simply leaves it with the jury to say whether that statement was willfully false or only inadvertently so. The evidence upon the point is not necessarily open to such interpretation. It is true that it may be susceptible of such an inference, but that inference was for the jury, untrammeled by the views of the court upon the subject. The defendant had stated that he was at Carr's during certain hours on that Sunday; that he remembered the day because of the accident to the buggy. Afterwards it turned out that the accident to the buggy occurred on a subsequent occasion, but it does not necessarily follow that because he was mistaken, or even intentionally misstated the incident about the buggy, his testimony was incorrect or false about being at the place indicated. In fact he is corroborated in part in the latter statement by Carr, who testified: "He was out there the Sunday before that. He was out there for two or three days before the day the buggy broke down. He was there Sunday, the 11th of June. I think he was there Saturday, Sunday, and Monday." It will thus be seen that the jury may well have seen fit, if left uninfluenced by the judgment of the court, to believe the defendant as to the time he was at Carr's house on the Sunday in question, notwithstanding the disparaging effect of the mistake as to the date of the buggy incident. What effect should be given to the latter when viewed in the light of all the evidence upon the fact in dispute was a question wholly committed to the jury, and the action of the court was, in effect, to withdraw it from their consideration. This was a plain invasion of the province of the jury and to the prejudice of defendant's constitutional right, for which the judgment must be reversed. People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802; People v. Gordon, 88 Cal. 422, 26 Pac. 502.

2. In view of the fact that the case must go back for a retrial, we will notice one other point. Upon the question of the credibility of witnesses the court, in speaking of the evidence of the defendant, said: "In looking at his testimony, you must remember it is the testimony of an accused man. Of course, he has a powerful motive to swear himself out of this charge. We all understand that. And while you are not to disbelieve him merely because he is in that situation, still you will not shut your eyes to the fact that he has that motive, and you will govern yourselves accordingly; that is to say, you will look at his testimony by the light of that fact. You may believe it after all. That is for you, as I said before, and so it is with any other witness. The law invites your attention to the motives of the witnesses." It is contended that by this language the court clearly indicated to the jury that it was of opinion the defendant should not be believed; that the effect of this part of the charge on the ordinary mind would be "that the defendant might possibly be believed, but it was not at all probable that he would tell the truth under the circumstances." We are inclined to think this criticism not without merit, and that the learned judge transcended the proper limitation of the rule which has been established by this court. We cannot do better in this regard than to repeat what is said by Mr. Justice McFarland in People v. Murray, supra: "We think that the court went too far in cautioning the jury against believing the defendant and the two other persons charged with the crime, although we would not be prepared to say that the judgment should be reversed for that reason. In People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191, it was held not to be error for a court, speaking of the credibility of a defendant, who was a witness for himself, to tell the jury that: 'You should consider his relation and situation under which he gives his testimony, the consequences to him from the result of this trial, and all the inducements and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation.' That instruction has been approved in subsequent cases, and it is now too late to question its correctness; but, if courts and prosecuting attorneys think it their duty to have an instruction on that subject in every case, they should be careful not to go further in that direction than courts have already done."

There are several other points strongly urged by appellant, but, in view of the fact that they involve questions which will not necessarily arise upon another trial, we do not deem it necessary to consider them at this time. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

SMITH v. FRATT et al. (No. 18,274.)

PREFERENCE BY INSOLVENT—SUIT TO SET ASIDE.

In an action by an assignee in insolvency to recover the value of property transferred by an insolvent debtor to defendants, findings that defendants neither knew nor believed, nor had reasonable cause to believe, that the debtor was insolvent, or made the deed in contemplation of insolvency, are sufficient to support a judgment for defendants.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. Van Fleet, Judge.

Action by S. B. Smith, assignee, against F. W. Fratt and George F. Parker, to recover the value of property conveyed to the defendants before the assignment. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Alexander, Albert M. Johnson, and Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. Denson & Oatman, George A. Blanchard, L. S. Taylor, and S. Solon Hall, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In January, 1887, James S. Meredith was adjudged to be an insolvent debtor, on petition of his creditors; and thereafter S. B. Smith, the plaintiff herein, was duly elected and appointed assignee of his estate. Smith qualified as such assignee, and the clerk of the court, by an instrument in writing, assigned and conveyed to him all the estate, real and personal, of the debtor.

Afterwards Smith, as such assignee, commenced this action to recover from the defendants the value of a stock of drugs and medicines alleged to have been sold and transferred to them by Meredith on December 9, 1886. The action was based upon the theory that, at the time of the transfer, Meredith was insolvent, and that it was made with a view on his part to give a preference to the defendants, who were then his creditors, and to prevent the property from coming to his assignee in insolvency, and being distributed ratably among his creditors, and that defendants, when they accepted the transfer, had reasonable cause to believe that he was insolvent, and that the transfer was made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in insolvency, and being distributed ratably among his creditors. The court found: That, at the time of the transfer, Meredith was indebted to Fratt, but not to Parker. That Meredith did not sell or deliver to Fratt the property described in the complaint, or any part thereof. That the transfer was made to Parker upon certain terms and conditions stated, and Meredith was at that time insolvent, and it was his desire to pay his debt due to Fratt in preference to other creditors, because it had been created in the purchase of this same stock of goods; "but neither Parker nor Fratt knew or believed that said Meredith was insolvent, nor did they or either of them believe, nor had either of them reasonable cause to believe, that Meredith entered into this agreement in contemplation of insolvency, or with the view of making Fratt a preferred creditor." "The defendant Parker did not purchase nor receive the transfer of said goods with the intention of giving or securing to Fratt any preference over other creditors of said Meredith, nor with intent to prevent said property from coming into the hands of the assignee of said Meredith, nor with intent to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among his creditors." Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

Three points are made for a reversal: (1) The insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings; (2) error of law in excluding certain testimony; (3) the insufficiency of the findings to support the judgment.

The first point relied upon cannot be sustained. The record shows that there was evidence sufficient to justify and support each of the findings assailed. Under the well-settled rules of this court, therefore, the judgment cannot be disturbed on this ground.

Only one error of law is complained of. When Meredith was being examined as a witness, he was asked by counsel for plaintiff, "Whom did you intend to benefit in making that transfer?" The question was objected to, and excluded by the court on the ground that it called for an opinion of the witness and was incompetent. Now, conceding that the ruling was erroneous, still we fail to see how the plaintiff was or could have been in any way prejudiced by it. The evident purpose of the question was to prove by the witness that he intended to benefit Fratt by the transfer, and in effect the court found that this was his intention. If, therefore, the question had been answered, the plaintiff's case would not have been strengthened.

The third point does not require any extended notice. The action was brought to recover the value of property alleged to have been transferred in violation of the provisions of section 55 of the insolvent act. That section provides that a transfer is void, and an assignee may recover the value of the property, when the person receiving such transfer, or to be benefited thereby, has reasonable cause to believe that the person making it is insolvent, and that such transfer is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in insolvency, or to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among his creditors. The findings here clearly negative the fact that either Fratt or Parker believed, or had reasonable cause to believe, that Meredith was insolvent when he made the transfer, or that it was made with a view to prevent the property from coming to his assignee, or being distributed ratably among his creditors. This being so, the findings were sufficient to show that the plaintiff had no cause of action, and to support the judgment. It follows that the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

SANTA CRUZ FAIR-BUILDING ASS'N v. GRANT. (No. 15,488.)

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The court's action in refusing a preliminary injunction will not be reviewed unless it shall clearly appear that there was an abuse of its discretion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCann, Judge.

Action by the Santa Cruz Fair-Building Association against John Grant, superintendent of streets, for a preliminary injunction restraining him from selling plaintiff's property to satisfy an assessment. From a denial of its motion, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Younger, for appellant. Z. N. Goldsby, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Under proceedings for the extension of Front street in the city of Santa Cruz, by virtue of the provisions of the act of March 6, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 70), the assessment had been confirmed by the city council, and placed in the hands of the superintendent of streets, and the defendant, who was such superintendent, was proceeding to collect it under the provisions of the act. The plaintiff, claiming to be the owner in fee of certain lands that had been assessed for the proposed improvement, commenced this action to obtain a judgment that the assessment was made without authority or jurisdiction on the part of the city, and that no lien upon its land was created thereby, and also that the defendant be enjoined from selling said lands to satisfy said assessment. In the complaint the plaintiff alleged, as the basis of its cause of action, that the city council had never passed any resolution describing the land deemed necessary to be taken for the extension of Front street, or specifying the exterior boundaries of the district to be affected by said improvement, and, after alleging the various steps taken under the above statute, further alleged that the defendant had advertised its lands described in the complaint for sale at public auction, and was threatening to sell the same for the purpose of satisfying said assessment. Prior to the issuance of the summons, the plaintiff moved the court upon the complaint that a preliminary injunction be granted at the time of the issuance of the summons, restraining the defendant, during the pendency of the action, from selling the land as described in the complaint. The court denied the application, and from this order the plaintiff has appealed.

The granting of a preliminary injunction is not a matter of right, but the application is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which is to be exercised according to the circumstances of the particular case (High, Inj. § 11); and its action upon such application will not be reviewed in the appellate court unless it shall clearly appear that there was an abuse of its discretion. Upon such application a court will consider whether a greater injury will result to the defendant from granting the injunction than to the plaintiff from refusing it; and if the court is satisfied, from the nature of the action and the threatened injury, that the rights of the plaintiff will be fully conserved by granting an injunction after a hearing upon the merits, while, in case the plaintiff should fail to sustain his complaint, the injury sustained by the defendant from the preliminary injunction could not be compensated, a wise discretion would dictate its refusal. Olmstead v. Koester, 14 Kan. 467. And in granting an injunction the court is bound to consider the amount of injury which may be thereby inflicted on strangers to the suit and third parties. 1 Joyce, Inj. 497. Chancellor Walworth said, in Dyeing Establishment v. Fitch, 1 Paige, 98: "There are many cases in which the complainant may be entitled to a perpetual injunction on the hearing, where it would be manifestly improper to grant an injunction in limine. The final injunction is in many cases matter of strict right, and granted as a necessary consequence of the decree made in the case. On the contrary, the preliminary injunction before answer is a matter resting altogether in the discretion of the court, and ought not to be granted unless the injury is pressing, and the delay dangerous." See, also, Mayor, etc., v. Curtiss, Clarke, Ch. 340. "An injunction in limine is not a matter of strict right. It may sometimes be properly refused upon the same facts which would entitle the party of right to an injunction on final hearing." Akin v. Davis, 14 Kan. 143. A party seeking to enjoin a public officer from the performance of an official duty should show by distinct averments that the threatened acts of the officer will interfere with his rights to such an extent as to cause him some irreparable injury. In the present case, if the city council had no jurisdiction to authorize the extension of Front street, the assessment would create no lien upon the lands of the plaintiff, and a purchaser at the sale would acquire no title. These facts would be determined by the final decree in the action, and the rights of the plaintiff could be thereby fully protected. On the other hand, if the plaintiff should fail to sustain the allegations of the complaint, the delay in the improvement that would be caused by a preliminary injunction might work damage to the public, and injuriously affect others than the defendant. Moreover, although it is alleged in the complaint that the defendant has advertised the lands of the plaintiff for sale at public auction, it does not appear at what time the sale was to be made; and one of the grounds upon which the court denied the application was that it had "on the previous day tried and determined a case under the same assessment and involving the same points." The court may have concluded that the present action could be tried and determined before the day of sale; and it may also have been so well informed of the nature of the defense to the action as to justify it in denying the application for a preliminary injunction. Stoddart v. Vanlaningham, 14 Kan. 18. As the appellant has failed to show that the court in any respect abused its discretion, the order is affirmed.

COULTERVILLE & Y. TURNPIKE CO. v. STATE. (No. 18,277.)

ACTION AGAINST STATE—ESTOPPEL OF STATE.

Where a turnpike corporation sued the state for an infringement upon an alleged exclusive grant, occasioned by a competitive legislative grant, the fact that the act of legislature conferring authority so to sue contained a recital in the introduction thereto that such exclusive privilege had been granted to the plaintiff will not preclude the state from availing itself of the defense of a denial of such grant, or of its validity, when it is clear from the language of the act that the legislature never so intended.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; J. E. Prewitt, Judge.

Action under legislative authority by the Coulterville & Yosemite Turnpike Company against the state of California to recover for alleged infringement on their grant. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick and James A. Waymire, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the State.

FITZGERALD, J. This action was brought under the authority conferred by an act of the legislature approved March 31, 1891, and is entitled "An act to enable the Coulterville and Yosemite Turnpike Company, a corporation, to sue the state of California for the loss and damage suffered and sustained by said corporation by the construction of a road by the Yosemite Turnpike Road Company, under and by virtue of an act of the legislature of the state of California, entitled 'An act granting the right-of-way to the Yosemite Turnpike Road Company over the Yosemite grant,' approved February 17, 1874, and for the relief of said Coulterville and Yosemite Turnpike Company." The facts stated in the complaint as constituting plaintiff's cause of action are the same as those recited in the preamble of the act referred to, and are alleged as follows: "(1) That the commissioners to manage the Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove, by their resolution adopted the 16th day of July, 1872, together with the written agreement dated the 13th day of August, 1872, agreed with plaintiff that plaintiff should have the exclusive right to construct and maintain a wagon road on the northerly or Coulterville side of the Merced river from a point on or near Crane Flat, past the line of survey of that reservation from the public lands of the United States known as the 'Yosemite Grant,' to and upon the level of the Yosemite valley, and should have the exclusive right to maintain a road on said side of the Merced river, and collect tolls thereon, for a term of ten years from the completion thereof; whereupon plaintiff, in consideration of said agreement, and in pursuance of said resolution and agreement, proceeded to construct said road, and the same was completed on the 18th day of June, 1874, and said commissioners, on the 3d day of July, 1874, accepted the same as so completed. (2) That in the year 1874 the legislature of the state of California passed an act entitled 'An act granting the right of way to the Yosemite Turnpike Road Company to construct a toll road over the Yosemite grant,' approved February 17, 1874; and under and by virtue of said act said Yosemite Turnpike Road Company constructed and completed a road on the northerly side of the Merced river, from a point near Gentry's Station to a point on the level of the Yosemite valley near El Capitan, which said road was completed in the month of July, 1874; and thereupon the said Yosemite Turnpike Road Company opened the said last-mentioned road for travel, and the same was continuously traveled by the public thereafter. (3) That the said last-mentioned road was on the northerly or Coulterville side of the Merced river, and conflicted with the exclusive privilege so granted to plaintiff; and, by reason of the construction and completion of the same, the said wagon road so completed by plaintiff became and was little used, and plaintiff suffered thereby, and by reason of the premises, great loss and damage, to wit, the sum of one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars ($125,000)." The complaint was demurred to generally, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and specially upon other grounds, but which, in the view that we have taken of the case, are not necessary to be considered. The demurrer was overruled by the court, and thereupon the defendant answered, setting up the following defenses: (1) A denial that the alleged exclusive privilege was ever granted to plaintiff; a denial that the road built by the Yosemite Turnpike Road Company conflicted with any exclusive privilege granted to plaintiff; and a denial of any damage. (2) That the Yosemite commissioners had no power to make the alleged agreement. (3) That the court had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, nor of the subject-matter of the action. (4) The statute of limitations. (5) That the said act under which this action was brought is unconstitutional. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, and judgment given for the defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and the order denying its motion for a new trial.

The questions raised by the record on this appeal, and upon which the conclusion we have reached is based, are: First. Whether the alleged exclusive privilege was ever granted to plaintiff by the agreement entered into between it and the said commissioners. Second. If it was not, is the defendant estopped from showing that fact by the recital to the contrary in the preamble to the act referred to? The first proposition is disposed of adversely to plaintiff by the finding of the court that the said commissioners did not agree with the plaintiff that it should have the exclusive right to construct or maintain a wagon road on the northerly side of the Merced river. This finding is fully justified by the evidence, and will not be disturbed, unless the defendant is concluded by the recital set forth in the preamble to the act stated in the second proposition. The sole object and purpose of that act was to empower the plaintiff to bring this action against the state; and, while it is true there is a recital in the introduction thereto that such exclusive privilege was granted to the plaintiff, yet it is perfectly clear from the reading of the act that the legislature never intended by this recital to preclude the state from availing itself of whatever defense it may have had against plaintiff's claim prior to the passage of the act. This is manifest from the language of the act itself, which provides that it shall be the duty of the attorney general "to defend said action and to interpose thereto such defenses, legal or equitable, as may exist, and which a private person under like circumstances might interpose." It is further provided that "if in said action a judgment shall be entered in favor of the plaintiff therein it shall be the duty of the attorney general to take an appeal therefrom to the supreme court of the state." If the act was susceptible of any other construction than the one we have given it, then the only question that could be determined on the trial of the case would be the amount of damages which plaintiff should recover. In disposing of the case upon these grounds, we do not wish to be understood as conceding that the commissioners had any authority whatever to grant the alleged or any other exclusive privilege. The remaining questions discussed by counsel orally and in their briefs are not necessary to be considered. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; HARRISON, J.; McFARLAND, J.

EGGER v. RHODES. (No. 19,286.)

EXPERT EVIDENCE.

One who has been a civil and hydraulic engineer for several years is qualified to testify as an expert in matters touching civil and hydraulic engineering.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John S. Campbell, Judge.

Action by F. W. Egger against C. H. Rhodes to rescind a contract for the sale of land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Allen, for appellant. H. C. Rolfe, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to rescind a contract for the sale of land. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals.

1. The demurrer to the complaint was general, and was properly overruled. The facts stated were fully sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

2. It was shown that the witness F. C. Finkle was and had been a civil and hydraulic engineer for several years. This was a sufficient foundation to qualify the witness to testify as an expert in regard to the matters to which his attention was called. The objection that no opportunity was given defendant to question the witness as to his preparation for doing the work of a civil engineer, or as to any work done by him while claiming to be such, is not sustained by the record. So far as appears, no such questions, or any others, were asked or attempted to be asked by defendant for the purpose of testing the competency or skill of the witness.

3. It is earnestly insisted that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings and decision of the court, but this point cannot be sustained. The findings cover all the issues, and are quite full and specific. To state the evidence in support of them would require a lengthy opinion, and no good would be accomplished by it. It is sufficient, in our opinion, to say that there was evidence sufficient to justify each of the findings assailed, and that the judgment cannot be reversed on this ground. We think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CONTRACT—ACCEPTANCE—VALIDITY.

1. Where an offer is in writing, signed and delivered by the party making it, and is accepted, and acted upon by both parties, it is sufficiently executed to make it a binding obligation upon both, and will not be construed as a unilateral agreement.

2. An agreement by a constable to make a levy on execution issued, and to take less than his legal fees therefor, making, in his return, full charges, where the value of the property levied upon is presumably less than the judgment and fees, is not void as against public policy.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by Lillian W. Bloom, as assignee of Charles M. Stetson, a constable, against George W. Hazzard, to recover certain fees. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Utley, for appellant. Carl Schutze, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff, as assignee of one Charles M. Stetson, brought this action to recover the sum of $844.90, balance alleged to be due and unpaid for services rendered by Stetson as constable in the levying upon and sale of certain real property under an execution issued upon a justice's court judgment in favor of the defendant. Before any services were rendered, Stetson executed and delivered to defendant an agreement in writing, reading as follows: "San Diego, Cal., Sept. 21, 1891. I, Charles M. Stetson, constable of San Diego township, California, agree that I will levy on the land herein described under the attached execution at the rate of $5 per day that I am actually employed at it; charging, however, in my return, the full charges and fees allowed by law. George W. Hazzard is, however, not to pay more for my work than said five dollars per day, and ten dollars for making the return. [Signed] Charles M. Stetson, Constable S. D. Township. Alfred E. Cowles, Deputy Constable." Stetson, by his deputy, made the levy and sale, and was engaged in the work 10½ days. The defendant bid in the property for $1,248.10, and the return shows that the constable's fees amounted to the sum of $928.90. On October 29, 1891, defendant paid to Stetson or his deputy $59.85, and of this sum $52.50 was to pay for said 10½ days' work at the agreed price of $5 per day, and $7.35 was to pay certain extra expenses. Afterwards, on November 2d, defendant paid Stetson $10, and received from him a receipt reading as follows: "San Diego, Cal., November 2, 1891. Received of George W. Hazzard the sum of $10 in full for fees in the case of George W. Hazzard vs. Santa Rosa Land and Improvement Company. Charles M. Stetson, Constable San Diego Township." The court found that " said Stetson received and accepted said several sums of money, aggregating in the whole the sum of $69.85, in full of all demands which he had against the defendant on account of his said services, and that said payments were made by defendant to said Stetson before said Stetson had made the assignment of his pretended claim to plaintiff, and that the defendant is not, and was not at the commencement of this action, indebted to plaintiff in any sum whatever." Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiff take nothing by her action, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, she appeals.

It is claimed for appellant that the agreement of September 21st was not a contract, and that at most it could only be considered a unilateral offer on the part of the constable, which required an unconditional acceptance to make it binding, and that "the writing as a contract in itself is void (a) because it is not executed by respondent,—that is, it does not show his assent; (b) because there is no second party to the instrument; (c) there is no mutuality of obligation or rights." The writing was more than a unilateral offer on the part of the constable. It was an agreement in writing signed and delivered by him to the defendant. It was accepted by defendant, and was acted upon by both parties. This was a sufficient execution to make the writing a binding obligation, and to meet all the objections above noted. Reedy v. Smith, 42 Cal. 245.

It is further claimed that the agreement was against public policy, and was therefore void. We fail to see any valid ground on which this claim can be sustained. The agreement was not intended to work any fraud or wrong upon any party; and, so far as appears, it cannot be classed as malum in se or malum prohibitum. It may be that the property to be levied on and sold was not worth enough to pay the judgment and the constable's legal fees for making the levy and sale, and if so there was no violation of public policy in his agreeing to take less than his legal fees. The property was not redeemed from the sale, and presumably because it was not worth what it was bid in for. It is admitted that it was orally understood that if the property should be redeemed, and the purchaser receive back the money bid, then he was to pay the constable the full amount of his fees. This was fair and just, and by the arrangement the law was in no way violated. We find no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 542 v. TURNER. (No. 18,248.)

RECLAMATION DISTRICT—INCORPORATION—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. A corporation organized to reclaim swamps and overflowed lands is of a quasi public character, and the proceedings leading up to its creation cannot be collaterally attacked.

2. Under Pol. Code, § 3454, providing that the trustees of a reclamation district shall have power to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, a right of way, and the right to take material for the construction of all works necessary to accomplish that object, including levees and embankments, the trustees of a reclamation district may acquire levees built by the owners of land for their own protection, where such levees are necessary to the reclamation of land within their district.

3. Where two of the three members of a board of trustees of a reclamation district are owners of different levees required for the purposes of the board, but have no interest in common therein, they are both disqualified to act in proceedings to acquire a levee belonging to either.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by reclamation district No. 542 against R. M. Turner to recover an assessment. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. V. Reardan, for appellant. Freeman & Bates, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The plaintiff claims to be a public corporation, organized March 11, 1892, under the provisions of the Political Code, for the purpose of reclaiming swamp and overflowed lands, and brought this action against the defendant to recover the amount of an assessment made upon his lands within the district for the purpose of constructing the works necessary to reclaim the lands therein, together with certain incidental expenses connected therewith. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and findings were filed, from which the conclusion was drawn that the defendant was entitled to judgment for his costs, and judgment was entered accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone.

1. The answer attacked the validity of the organization of the district as a corporation, and alleged that it had no capacity to sue. This court has repeatedly held that corporations similar to the plaintiff in this case are of a quasi public character, and that the legality and regularity of the proceedings leading up to their final creation cannot be attacked collaterally. This is the course attempted to be pursued here, and a long line of authority is opposed to it. See Quint v. Hoffman (Cal.) 37 Pac. 514, 777, and cases there cited.

The second and sixth findings of fact are as follows: "(2) That on or about the 11th day of March, 1892, plaintiff employed B. L. McCoy as engineer, as alleged in its complaint, and for the purposes therein alleged, and he, thereafter, as in said complaint alleged, did survey, plan, locate, and report a system of reclamation and an estimate of the cost of the work necessary for the reclamation of the lands in the district and of the lands needed for right of way, and the amounts estimated and reported by him were as stated in said complaint; that in such report said engineer stated that there were already existing within the district a line of old levees, which were adopted by him as a part of the system of reclamation, and which, at the date of such report, belonged to private persons, and were by such engineer reported to be thirty-eight thousand eight hundred (38,800) feet in length; and he reported that such old levees, from actual measurement, were worth $11,156.94, and that such sum ought to be paid therefor, of which sum he recommended that $7,987.92 be paid to persons acting as trustees of plaintiff, and that such sum be paid to the persons and in the amounts stated in defendant's answer; that said old levees are upon lands within said district, and were constructed prior to the taking of any steps for the organization of plaintiff, and were at the date of said report, and still are, the property of the persons on whose lands they are situated; that the said plaintiff has no means wherewith to purchase the title or the right to use said old levees, except by the levy and collection of an assessment upon the lands within the district; that the sum of $2,850, referred to in said complaint, was made up of the several items and amounts stated in subdivision 2 of defendant's answer; that at the time said report was made, and ever thereafter, J. M. Hoyl, William James, and E. White were trustees of plaintiff, and the said James and White were the owners of old levees adopted as part of the system of reclamation, but said James and said White had no interests in common in said old levees; that said report of said engineer was adopted by the unanimous vote of all three of said trustees." "(6) That it was at no time understood or agreed by or between plaintiff herein, or the trustees hereof, and the landowners within said district, that no landowner should receive or be entitled to any thing or sum in excess of the amount which should be assessed against his lands for benefits thereto; nor was there at any time an agreement between said plaintiff, or its trustees, and E. White that said White should not receive any sum in excess of the amount assessed against him for benefits." Section 3454 of the Political Code provides: "The board of trustees shall have power to elect one of its members president thereof; to appoint engineers and others to survey, plan, locate and estimate the cost of the works necessary for the reclamation of the lands of the district; to thereafter, at any time in its discretion, modify or change such original plan or plans, or adopt new, supplemental or additional plan or plans when, in its judgment, the same shall have become necessary; to acquire by purchase, condemnation or otherwise the right-of-way, and the right to take material for the construction of all works necessary for the accomplishment of that object, including drains, canals, sluices, bulk-heads, water-gates, levees and embankments, and to construct, maintain and keep in repair all works requisite and necessary to that end; and to do all other acts and things necessary or required for the reclamation of the lands embraced in the district." Here were more than seven miles of embankment already in existence. Assuming that new embankments where none existed would complete the reclamation of the entire district, the old embankments would, nevertheless, be in fact used for the accomplishment of that work. The old embankments were private property, however, built, doubtless, for the sole benefit and protection of the lands of the owner. It would therefore seem unjust that they should be used as part of an entire system for the benefit of others, as well as the owners, without being taken into the account, or that the owners should be assessed for the construction of new embankments covering the same space. We do not think it could have been the intention of the legislature that the existence of embankments within the district should prevent the full reclamation of all the lands within it, or that any part of the system should not be under the control of the corporation, as must be the case if the old embankments remain private property. If the embankments did not exist, it is clear that a right of way for their construction could be acquired by purchase or condemnation; nor do we see that the existence of the embankments constitutes any obstacle to the procurement of the right of way over the same ground, the embankments simply adding to the value of the right of way; or, if that be doubtful, we think it may fall within the "all other acts and things requisite or necessary" to the reclamation of the lands within the district, the words "necessary or requisite" including that which is expedient. How this can be equitably adjusted between the different land holders within the district is a question that is not before us.

2. The second point made by respondent,—viz. that two of the three trustees, being interested in the existing levees or embankments, which, according to the estimate of the engineer, constituted, in round numbers, one-half the entire cost of reclamation (aside from incidental expenses), were incapacitated by reason of their interest,—we think, must be sustained. The estimated value of the whole of the old embankments is $11,156.94, and of that owned by James and White, two of the trustees, $7,987.92. Appellant insists that, as James and White were not jointly interested in any part of the old levees, as to the value of the several interests of each, two of the trustees were disinterested and competent to act, and as to the report of the engineer, upon which the assessment was based, the board of supervisors acted, the latter board being wholly disinterested and independent, and that, therefore, the proceeding is unaffected by the personal interest of these trustees. It is not necessary to assume that the engineer was partial or prejudiced in favor of the trustees who employed him, nor that his estimate of the value of the embankments was unfair, nor that the trustees, if this assessment were collected, would pay more or less than the estimated value of these embankments. The rule involved is broader and deeper, and does not require the defendant to show that he would in fact be injured. The rule is that where the personal or individual interest of an officer or agent conflicts with that of his principal, whether such principal be an individual or the public or a corporation, he cannot, unless under special circumstances, bind his principal. Appellant is mistaken in supposing that the duties of the trustees are merely perfunctory. They employ the engineer, and such employment involves selection. He could not be selected and employed by the one disinterested trustee; and in this selection and employment the personal interests of these two trustees were involved, and were in conflict with the interests of the defendant and of all who were not the owners of embankments. Whether the embankments shall be ultimately acquired at a less cost than the value placed upon them by the engineer does not affect the assessment based upon his estimate, nor the judgment to be rendered against respondent if the proceedings should be held valid. It may be conceded that, if but one of the trustees was interested in the old embankment, the action of the others could be sustained in any purchase that might be made of them by the district; but it would be turning a very sharp corner for James to say to White, "You and Mr. Hoyl fix the value on my embankment, and buy it for the district, and he and I will buy yours," as each would be interested to increase the price of the other's property in order to increase the price of his own; and, if condemnation proceedings were resorted to, they would be defendants while prosecuting the proceedings on behalf of the district. If we are right in holding that the old embankments can be acquired by the district, and used as part of the reclamation works, we think it must follow that, since all in the district are not owners of embankments, at least a majority of the board of trustees must be composed of nonowners of such embankments.

Some other questions are made by respondent concerning the regularity of the assessment, but these do not now require notice. We would, however, in view of possible future proceedings, call attention to section 3466, Pol. Code, as amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 288), which seems to have been overlooked by counsel. Under this section the cause of action did not accrue until 20 days after the date of the order made by the trustees, whereas this suit was commenced in 15 days after the order was made; nor did the order require payment in installments, as provided by said amended section. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HUNT v. BRODERICK, Auditor. (No. 15,561.)

CLAIM AGAINST COUNTY — MANDAMUS TO COMPEL AUDIT—APPEAL TO SUPERVISORS.

1. Mandamus lies to compel the county auditor to audit a valid claim against the county which has been allowed by the board of supervisors acting within their powers.

2. Consolidation Act, § 92, providing for an appeal to the board of supervisors from the rejection of a claim by the county auditor, does not apply to claims already passed on by the board, or which must be presented in the first instance for its sanction.

3. Act May 17, 1861, empowers the board of supervisors to allow a sum not exceeding $5,000 in any one fiscal year as counsel fees. Act Feb. 25, 1878, provides that the board shall not pay out in any one month more than one-twelfth of any claim allowed by law for the fiscal year, and further provides that if, at the beginning of a month, any money remains which might have been expended in past months, it may be carried forward and expended in any succeeding months. Held, that the board may properly allow at one time a counsel fee of $2,000.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Mandamus, on the relation of John Hunt, executor of the will of George F. Sharp, deceased, against William Broderick, county auditor, to compel the auditing of a claim against the county. From a judgment granting the writ, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. T. Creswell, for appellant. E. G. Knapp, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment of the superior court in a mandamus proceeding, by which the defendant, as auditor, was required to audit, allow, etc., a certain claim and demand of plaintiff against the city and county of San Francisco which had been duly passed and allowed by the board of supervisors of said city and county. The appeal is upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. We see no good reason for disturbing the judgment of the court below. There is no doubt from the evidence that the demand of respondent's intestate, Sharp, was a just one. The defenses and the points made here for reversal are in their nature technical; that is, they are based upon alleged irregularities committed by said Sharp, deceased, in presenting his demand and in prosecuting the appeal, and upon certain statutory provisions claimed to be obstructions which shut out his right of recovery.

1. Appellant objects to the form of demand, because it does not so specify the items thereof as to sufficiently comply with section 84 of the consolidation act. The demand was for legal services rendered by Sharp as an attorney in a protracted litigation, which resulted in the recovery by the city of valuable real property, viz. city slip lot No. 43. In his original petition to the board, Sharp, in reciting the history of his services, mentioned certain disbursements which in the course of the litigation he had paid out of his own pocket; and, if these are to be considered part of the demand finally allowed by the board, they were, perhaps, not sufficiently itemized. But we think the court was justified by the evidence in finding "that the said demand was and is for counsel fees alone, and was so treated and regarded, and as such allowed and approved by both the judiciary committee and the finance committee of the said board of supervisors, and as such was ordered paid by said board of supervisors, and as such allowed and approved by the mayor of said city and county, the ex officio president of said board, as such demand for counsel fees;" and there was certainly a sufficient specification of the counsel fees.

2. Where the board of supervisors have not exceeded their powers in allowing a demand, and the latter is a valid and legal claim against the county, it is the duty of the auditor to audit it, and mandamus will lie to compel him to do so. Gaslight Co. v. Dunn, 62 Cal. 589; Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766, and cases there cited; Sweeny v. Maynard, 52 Cal. 468; Railroad Co. v. Stockton, 51 Cal. 328; Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488; Enkle v. Edgar, 63 Cal. 188.

3. Appellant contends that respondent should have appealed from the refusal of the appellant to audit his claim to the board of supervisors, under section 92 of the consolidation act, and that his failure to do so bars his right to a writ of mandate; and this point is the one most discussed in the briefs of counsel. The point seems to have been necessarily decided by this court in several cases adversely to the contention of appellant; but it has not been expressly mentioned in any opinion of the court to which our attention has been called. In Weed v. Maynard, 52 Cal. 460, Enkle v. Edgar, 63 Cal. 188, Gaslight Co. v. Dunn, 62 Cal. 580, and Welch v. Strother, 74 Cal. 413, 16 Pac. 22, and other cases, writs of mandate to the auditor have been sustained, or granted here originally, where no appeal had been taken to the board of supervisors, although the matter was not alluded to in the opinions; and we have not examined the transcripts and briefs in those cases to see if the point was raised. But, apart from authority, we are satisfied that where a valid legal demand has been regularly considered, passed, and allowed by the board, and the auditor has refused to audit it, he may be compelled so to do by mandamus, although the claimant has taken no appeal to the board. In the first place, if the appeal mentioned in section 92 was intended to apply to a case where the board had already passed upon and allowed the demand, the appeal would not afford a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. In fact, it would afford no remedy at all. The board would have no more power to enforce its order after a second approval than before. "To supersede the remedy by mandamus, a party must not only have a specific adequate remedy, but one competent to afford relief upon the very subject-matter of his application." Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 508. The board could not compel the specific act to be done by which alone respondent can obtain his rights. But, furthermore, we do not think that said section 92 was intended to apply, or does apply, to a case where the demand has once been passed upon by the board, and which must, in the first instance, be presented to and determined by the board itself. There is no necessity of such a construction of the section as will present the anomaly of an appeal to a tribunal of the very thing which it has already deliberately and finally determined. There are many instances where various officers of the city and county have power, in the first instance, and without any previous action of the board of supervisors, to allow or reject demands. The auditor, for instance, is given power to allow or reject many and various kinds of demands which need not to be first presented to the board (see sections 82–85); and it is with respect to these latter demands that said section 92 provides that "if any person feels aggrieved by the decision of the auditor, or any other proper officer or officers of said city and county, except the board of education, in the rejection of, or refusal to approve or allow any demand upon the treasury presented by such person, he may appeal, and have the same passed upon by the board of supervisors, whose decision thereon shall be final." Clearly, this refers to a demand "presented" in the first instance to "the auditor or other proper officer," and which has not already been "passed upon by the board of supervisors." This construction makes the system harmonious, and gives to every claimant the right, at some time to have his demand considered by the board of supervisors, who are the final, and, as was said in Babcock v. Goodrich, supra, "the real, auditing power." Falk v. Strother, 84 Cal. 544, 22 Pac. 676, and 24 Pac. 110, cited by appellant, is not in point. Moreover, in that case the demand in question was first approved by the board of election commissioners, and, after rejection by the auditor, went to the board of supervisors for the first time on appeal.

4. The point is also made, though not very strenuously insisted on, that respondent's demand was invalid under the act commonly known as the "One-Twelfth Act."[1] We confess that we hardly see how that act can under any view be successfully applied to a case like the one at bar. By the act of May 17, 1861, the board is given the power to allow, out of the general fund, not exceeding $5,000 in any one fiscal year for the employment of special counsel; and it seems to be argued that because $2,000, the amount of the demand in the case at bar, is more than one-twelfth of $5,000, therefore it could not be properly allowed. How, then, could counsel ever be employed where the services would be worth more than one-twelfth of $5,000? If the board be held as restricted to $5,000 a year in the aggregate for counsel fees, it could not expend more than that amount in any fiscal year; but no such question arises here. The one-twelfth act provides that if, at the beginning of a month, any money remains which might have been expended in past months, it may be carried forward and expended in any succeeding months; and we may assume that the court properly found that the $2,000 was not more than the one-twelfth of the fund under such act. The evidence presented in the bill of exceptions may be assumed to be only that necessary to illustrate the exceptions taken, which did not include the point as to said one-twelfth act.

There is no other point necessary to be noticed. The judgment is affirmed.

CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION—CORPORATIONS—LEASE OF FRANCHISE.

1. Where one party to a contract acquired possession of the property of the other by means of it, and induced that other party to forego for a period its possession and use, there was a sufficient consideration for the contract.

2. Where a corporation secures a franchise, by municipal grant, to operate gas and electric works, and to supply the inhabitants with the product, it becomes its legal duty so to do; and a lease of its works and privileges is ultra vires, and void as against public policy.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; William W. Cross, Judge.

Action by Visalia Gas & Electric Light Company against J. F. Sims and W. B. Morris, sureties for its lessee, Lynch. Verdict for plaintiff. Defendants appealed. Reversed.

Wm. H. H. Hart (A. R. Cotton and Nowlin & Fassett, of counsel), for appellants. N. O. Bradley and Bradley & Farnsworth, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. The complaint charges that plaintiff leased to one Lynch, June 24, 1887, certain premises, including the plant of the Electric Light & Gas Company, for the term of two years from June 1, 1887; that Lynch agreed to take possession, manage, control, and operate the same, and to pay said company every three months during the term all the receipts of said gas and electric light business, after paying all necessary charges and expenses incurred in carrying on said business, and further agreed that the amount so paid should be sufficient to enable it to pay an annual dividend to its stockholders of 5 per cent. upon its capital stock of $28,000, and in case of deficiency he would pay to such company every three months such further sums as would enable it to pay such dividend; that defendants became sureties by signing an agreement indorsed on said agreement of lease, whereby they agreed, if said Lynch failed to pay plaintiff such sums, or any sums which might be due, they would pay the same; that Lynch took possession of the demised property, and retained it until June 1, 1889, without paying plaintiff any sums of money as rents or receipts from said business; that on the 1st of June, 1888, there became due plaintiff on said agreement $1,400, and on the 1st of June, 1889, the sum of $1,400; that no part of said sums has been paid. The answer contains several defenses. (1) It denies that Lynch held possession for two years, and avers that plaintiff ejected him August 1, 1888. (2) There was no consideration for Lynch's agreement. (3) No consideration for the agreement to pay sums additional to the receipts from the business. (4) Receipts did not exceed the expenses. There was therefore a failure of consideration. (5) The contract of defendants was without consideration. (6) Failure of consideration for sureties' agreement. (7) Want of consideration again pleaded. (8) Plaintiff was incorporated to furnish gas and electricity to the inhabitants of Visalia for illuminating purposes. The alleged lease was therefore ultra vires. (9) The contract is ultra vires, and against public policy. A defense by amendment sets up the incorporation of plaintiff for specific purposes of furnishing light to the inhabitants; an ordinance procured by it from the city, authorizing it to lay pipes in the streets, and to erect masts for electric lights; the acceptance of the franchise; the construction of the works; the duty of the corporation to furnish gas and electric lights in consideration of the privileges; and its undertaking that the works shall not constitute a nuisance,—and again charges that the lease to Lynch was against public policy and void. The findings and judgment are for plaintiff. Nevertheless, the court found that the receipts from the demised property were insufficient to pay running expenses; that plaintiff was incorporated for the purpose of manufacturing coal gas, and to sell such gas and electricity to the inhabitants of Visalia, and was by ordinance authorized to lay down and maintain gas pipes in the streets of said city, and through such pipes supply the inhabitants with gas, and to erect and maintain poles, masts, and wires to conduct electricity through said city; that prior to the making of said agreement it had accepted said franchise, and had laid its pipes in the streets of said city, and erected the poles, masts, and wires, and when the lease was made was in the possession of and using said plant and said franchises; that among other restrictions imposed by such ordinance was the requirement that the works should be so constructed and used as not to become a nuisance; that no authority was conferred by said ordinance upon plaintiff to lease or assign such franchise.

[1] Act Feb. 25, 1878, provides "that it shall not be lawful for the board of supervisors to authorize, pay or render payable in any one month, any demands against said treasury which shall in the aggregate exceed one twelfth part of the amount allowed by laws existing at the time of such contract, authorization or payment, to be expended within the fiscal year of which said month is a part."

1. Defendants contend that the lease and their undertaking as sureties are void, because not supported by a valuable consideration. The lease is supposed to be unsupported by a valuable consideration, because it, in terms, binds the lessee to pay over to the lessor all moneys received, over and above running expenses. Therefore, it is said, there was no chance for a profit to the lessee. His agreement to take care of and manage the works, and to guaranty a certain profit, was gratuitous. The contract bound him to do it for nothing. We need not inquire what induced Lynch to enter into a contract so one-sided. He may have had a motive which is not apparent. As matter of law, however, the contract was supported by a sufficient consideration. This may as well consist in detriment to the lessor as in profit to him. By the contract he acquired possession of the property for two years, and induced plaintiff to forego for the same period its possession and use. Who can say that plaintiff could not and would not have realized a profit from the property, but for the lease?

2. The main defense, however, is that the lease is ultra vires, and against public policy. The real question presented is not that the lease is ultra vires as to the corporation, but that, plaintiff having availed itself of the franchise granted it by the city of Visalia, it became its legal duty to operate its gas and electric works, and to supply the inhabitants with gas and electricity, and it was therefore against public policy to lease those works and privileges to Lynch, and thus disable itself for the time from performing its duty. This proposition is clearly maintained in Thomas v. Railroad Co., 101 U. S. 71. That was the case of a lease of a railroad and franchise. The court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller: "Where a corporation like a railroad company has granted to it by charter a franchise intended in large measure to be exercised for the public good, the due performance of those functions being the consideration of the public grant, any contract which disables the corporation from performing those functions,—which undertakes, without the consent of the state, to transfer to others the rights and powers conferred by the charter, and to relieve the grantees of the burden which it imposes,—is a violation of the contract with the state, and is void as against public policy. This doctrine is asserted with remarkable clearness in the opinion of this court, delivered by Mr. Justice Campbell, in Railroad Co. v. Winans, 17 How. 30. * * * 'This conclusion [argument] implies that the duties imposed upon the plaintiff by the charter are fulfilled by the construction of the road, and that by alienating its right to use, and its powers of control and supervision, it may avoid further responsibility. But those acts involve an overturn of the relations which the charter has arranged between the corporation and the community. Important franchises were conferred upon the corporation, to enable it to provide facilities for communication and intercourse required for the public convenience. Corporate management and control over these were prescribed, and corporate responsibility for their insufficiency provided as a remuneration to the community for their grant. The corporation cannot absolve itself from the performance of its obligations without the consent of the legislature.'" This case was cited and approved in Green Bay & M. R. Co. v. Union Steamboat Co., 107 U. S. 198, 2 Sup. Ct. 221, and in Oregon Ry. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian Ry. Co., 130 U. S. 1, 9 Sup. Ct. 409. So, too, the customers are interested in having a responsible party to deal with. The city has provided such a party in its contract with the corporation, for such it has been held to be. People v. Chicago Gas-Trust Co., 130 Ill. 268, 22 N. E. 798; Gibbs v. Gas Co., 130 U. S. 411 9 Sup. Ct. 553. The same conclusion is reached upon the principle that they cannot delegate functions and powers given to them. "Delegatus non potest delegare." The subject is extensively discussed in Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 656, 1114, 1116, 1129. In the last section he says that the principle applies to gas companies. The author's conclusions accord with the cases above cited. In fact, respondent has furnished no cases to the contrary.

It is said, however, that when a contract which was ultra vires has been performed by one party the other is then estopped to plead that the contract was ultra vires. Here, however, the contract was void because against public policy. In such cases, courts will not give relief to either party. Respondent contends that the rule is different as to corporations, and some cases seem to sustain the claim. It is impossible to see why there should be a difference in such cases because one party is a corporation. It is sometimes said, however, that a contract of a corporation is against public policy when it is simply ultra vires, because it is against public policy that a corporation should assume to exercise powers not granted. In such case it is simply an executed ultra vires contract. But it may also be an attempt to do that which is unlawful without reference to the corporate franchise, —a contract which would be unlawful in a natural person. In such case the contract of the corporation is subject to the same rule which obtains in the case of individuals. But it would make no difference here. The lessee, it is found, made nothing from the lease. The rule is the same that it would have been had the corporation been sued. Says Morawetz (section 715): "If money or property is given to a corporation under a contract which is void because the agent assuming to represent the corporation in the transaction had no authority to bind it, the corporation is liable to account for the money or other property received. * * * Thus, in Burges and Stock's Case, 2 Johns. & H. 441, the directors of a life assurance company had issued policies of marine insurance, and applied the premiums to the use of the company. Upon winding up the company the holders of the policies were held not to be entitled to prove for losses, but were allowed the amount of the premiums paid. Vice Chancellor Page-Wood said: 'They had no consideration for the premiums they paid. The directors, it is true, had no power to issue marine policies, but they had power to receive money, and apply it for the benefit of the company. It is proved that they did so receive and apply these premiums, and the amount might have been recovered, even at law, as money had and received.'" So, he says, a corporation cannot be charged with a loan of money made by its directors without authority, but if any portion of the money has been applied to the proper uses of the company it may be held liable to that extent at least. It is said: "The liability of the company does not, in such case, arise from the contract entered into by the directors, but from the equitable right of the lender to recover his money, which has gone to swell the company's assets." I think this is the principle which underlies most of the cases upon this subject, although forced to admit that some are not consistent with it. This action is on the contract to recover an amount of money which the lessee guarantied the property would pay, but which it did not. It is not for any amount of benefit which he received from the contract. It is found that he received no benefit upon it. The fact that there was a consideration which would prevent the contract from being a nudum pactum for the want of it does not make a case of benefits to be paid for, where a contract is ultra vires; and the contract, being against public policy, should not be enforced. I recommend that the judgment be set aside, and judgment on the findings ordered for defendants.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is set aside, and judgment on the findings ordered for defendants.

Ex parte ROACH. (No. 21,117.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—LICENSE FROM CITY—COUNTY SUPERVISORS.

A person carrying on the liquor business within a city, who has received a license from the city, and is acting in conformity with its ordinances, cannot be prosecuted for a failure to observe the provisions of an ordinance of the supervisors of the county in which the city is situated, requiring liquor stores to be closed at a certain hour.

In bank.

Application by William M. Roach for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ allowed.

Horace L. Smith, for petitioner. S. Solon Holl, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The petitioner is held by the sheriff of Kings county under a warrant of arrest issued by a justice of the peace of Lucerne township, in that county, upon a complaint charging him with having on the 13th of April, 1894, sold at his saloon, in the city of Hanford, certain intoxicating liquor, in violation of an ordinance of the board of supervisors of Kings county. The ordinance which the petitioner is charged with violating is entitled "An ordinance for the purpose of regulation, relating to saloons and other places where intoxicating liquors are sold, given away, or in any manner disposed of," and makes it unlawful for any person to sell any intoxicating liquor at a saloon between the hours of 10 o'clock p. m. and 5 o'clock a. m. of the succeeding day. The city of Hanford is a municipal corporation of the sixth class, organized under the municipal government act of March 13, 1893, and had prior to the 13th of April, 1894, passed an ordinance providing for the issuance of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The petitioner had complied with the provisions of this ordinance, and had received from the city of Hanford a license to carry on the business of retailing liquor within that city, which was in force at the time of his arrest. It is contended on the part of the petitioner that he is illegally held, for the reason that the supervisors of Kings county are without any police authority within the city of Hanford; that the ordinance passed by that body under which he was arrested is limited in its operation to those portions of the county not included within the boundaries of any municipality therein.

A municipal corporation can exercise only such powers as have been expressly or by necessary implication conferred upon it by law. These powers are to be found in its charter, or in some provision of the statute or constitution of the state wherein it is organized. Any ordinance passed by it within the scope of the authority expressly conferred upon it has the same force within the corporate limits as a statute passed by the legislature itself has throughout the state. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 308; Village of Carthage v. Frederick, 122 N. Y. 268, 25 N. E. 480. Each derives its authority from the same source, and is an exercise of legislative power which has been conferred by the people. In the one case the power is exercised directly by the legislature, and in the other it is the exercise of a delegated power which has been authorized by the constitution, but in both cases the source of the power is the same. Any inconsistency between the two is to be resolved in favor of the ordinance, upon the principle that of two statutes containing inconsistent provisions that which is later in date is a repeal by implication of the earlier one, and upon the further principle that a statute making particular provision for a designated object or district will be deemed to contain the legislative will for that object or district, and will prevail over a general law applicable to the state at large. State v. Clarke, 54 Mo. 17; State v. Clarke, 25 N. J. Law, 54; St. Johnsbury v. Thompson, 59 Vt. 300, 9 Atl. 571; Daw v. Board, 12 C. B. (N. S.) 161; Suth. St. Const. § 140. The adoption of the ordinance, being the exercise of a delegated legislative power, is to be construed with the same effect as if it had been adopted by the legislative power itself. Upon this principle, ordinances passed by a municipality whose territory is included within a county will supersede any ordinance of the county upon the same subject. Each being the exercise of a legislative power derived from the same source, is to be construed as though each had been the exercise of that power by the legislature itself.

Section 6 of article 11 of the constitution provides: "Corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws; but the legislature by general laws shall provide for the incorporation, organization and classification in proportion to population of cities and towns, which laws may be altered, amended or repealed." Under this authority the legislature, in 1883 (St. 1883, p. 93), adopted a municipal government act for the incorporation and organization of cities. Section 1 of this act provides: "Any portion of a county containing not less than five hundred inhabitants, and not incorporated as a municipal corporation, may become incorporated under the provisions of this act, and when so incorporated shall have the powers conferred, or that may be hereafter conferred by law, upon municipal corporations of the class to which the same may belong." By virtue of this act the city of Hanford has been carved out of the territory of Kings county, and organized into a city with the powers conferred by the act. Section 11 of article 11 of the constitution provides: "Any county, city, town or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." The power to make these regulations is by this section conferred upon the city as well as upon the county, and must be held to be equally authoritative in each. It is a portion of the lawmaking power which the people through their constitution have conferred upon these respective bodies, and its exercise is entitled to the same consideration and to receive the same obedience as that portion of the same power which by the same instrument has been conferred upon the legislature. The regulations made under this authority are none the less a part of the law because the authority to make them is conferred immediately by the constitution than if it had been conferred immediately through an act of the legislature. The only limitation upon the exercise of the power is that the regulations to be made under it shall not be "in conflict with general laws." As this limitation applies equally to regulations of the county and the city, it cannot be held by the terms of the limitation that the regulation of either of these bodies is a general law for the other; and it is held that an ordinance passed by a county is not a "general law," within the meaning of this section of the constitution. Ex parte Campbell, 74 Cal. 25, 15 Pac. 318. The constitution recognizes the division of the state into counties, and has authorized the legislature to establish for them a uniform system of government; but it has also authorized the creation of other municipalities within the boundaries of the several counties, and has given to such municipalities the same power of legislation upon these enumerated subjects as is conferred upon the counties themselves; and the power thus conferred by the constitution is to be construed, if possible, in such a way as to give full effect to its exercise by each of the designated bodies. It is no more necessary that there be a conflict between the power thus to be exercised by the county and the city than if the authority of each had been derived through an act of the legislature. It is not to be supposed that it was the intention of the people, through their constitution, to authorize a county to exercise the same power within the territory of the city as the city itself could exercise, or to confer upon the county the right to interfere with or impair the effect of similar legislation by the city itself. Mr. Dillon says (section 184): "There cannot be at the same time within the same territory two distinct municipal corporations exercising the same powers, jurisdictions, and privileges." Full effect can be given to the section by holding that each has been given the exclusive right of legislation within its own particular boundaries. By the organization of a city within the boundaries of a county, the territory thus organized is withdrawn from the legislative control of the county upon the designated subjects, and is placed under the legislative control of its own council; and the principle of local government which pervades the entire instrument is convincing of the intention to withdraw the city from the control of the county, and to deprive the county of any power to annul or supersede the regulations of the city upon the subjects which have been confined to its control. In Ex parte Wolters, 65 Cal. 269, there was nothing in the record to indicate whether the ordinance then under consideration was for the purpose of revenue or regulation, or for both. In their brief, counsel for the petitioner expressly stated that the purpose of the writ was to test the question of the power of the board of supervisors to exact from persons transacting business in the county a license tax for revenue purposes. The right of the county of Butte to exercise within any city in the county the police power conferred by section 11 of article 11 of the constitution was not presented or considered by the court, and counsel expressly disclaimed any intention to argue that question. It did not even appear that the sale of the liquor for which the defendant was under arrest was made within the limits of any city. In Ex parte Campbell, 74 Cal. 25, 15 Pac. 318, where an ordinance of the city of Pasadena prohibiting the sale of wines or liquors in saloons and barrooms was under consideration, it was held that any regulations of the county of Los Angeles could not have the power to divest the authorities of the city of the right to legislate upon the same subject, and enforce such regulations within the city limits. In re Lawrence, 69 Cal. 608, 11 Pac. 217, presented the single question whether the county as well as the city had the right to collect a license tax for the business of selling liquor, and did not involve any question of the exercise of a police power. We are clearly of the opinion that the ordinance of the board of supervisors of Kings county is inoperative within the city of Hanford, and that the petitioner is illegally restrained of his liberty, and must be discharged; and it is so ordered.

JOHNSTON v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF GLENN COUNTY. (No. 13,295.)

HIGHWAYS—REPORT OF VIEWERS.

Pol. Code, § 2688, provides that, after hearing the report of viewers in the laying out of a highway, the supervisors must declare the report to be approved or rejected in whole or in part. Held, that where, under a bill of review directed to a board of supervisors, it appears that a viewers' report is regular on its face, and the only question raised is whether the report was true, the action of the supervisors in approving the report will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Glenn county; Seth Millington, Judge.

Application by Mary S. Johnston for a bill of review commanding the board of supervisors of Glenn county to return proceedings laying out a road. The writ was dismissed, and the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Charles L. Donohoe, for appellant. Geo. D. Dudley and F. C. Lusk, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. On the petition of plaintiff the superior court of Glenn county issued a writ of review to the defendant board, commanding it to certify and return to that court all its proceedings in laying out and establishing a public road upon plaintiff's land. It is not disputed that the defendant obeyed the writ by returning certified copies of all matters of record, and all matters required to be recorded, relating to the laying out and establishing of said road, showing among other things that the board duly appointed three persons, Stockwell, Knock, and Armstrong, as viewers of the proposed road, a majority of whom—Armstrong and Knock—reported to the board that they had viewed and surveyed the proposed road, and that they recommended that it be established and opened. The board approved the report of the viewers, and ordered the road "to be opened as a public road according to law," and declared the amount of damages awarded to each nonconsenting landowner, and that the amount awarded to plaintiff for damages was $1,010. The court below found that in the matter of laying out the road the defendant had not, in any respect, exceeded its lawful jurisdiction, and thereupon dismissed the writ.

For the alleged purpose of showing that the report of the viewers was null and void, the plaintiff, on the trial, offered as evidence the ex parte affidavit of W. H. Sale, clerk of the board, to the effect that, on the hearing of the report of the viewers by the board, he heard Armstrong, one of the signers of that report, testify under oath that he (Armstrong) did not "survey or lay out, or help to view or survey or lay out, said road, as contained in the report of the viewers upon which said board of supervisors was acting." This affidavit was objected to by defendant on several grounds. The court sustained the objection, and plaintiff excepted. Whether or not the court erred in excluding Sale's affidavit is the only question properly presented for decision on this appeal. The bill of exceptions shows, however, that, after Sale's affidavit was ruled out, plaintiff "offered to prove" by additional affidavits and by parol testimony that Armstrong did not view the road, and that the official written report of the viewers was false in that respect; but it does not appear that any witness or additional affidavit was produced or offered for this purpose, nor that there was any ruling by the court, or exception by plaintiff, relating to this offer. The bill of exception shows that a day was fixed for hearing the report of the viewers, and notice thereof given, in full compliance with section 2688 of the Political Code, which section, in addition to requiring a day for the hearing to be fixed, and notice thereof to be given, further provides: "The board must, on the day fixed for the hearing, or to which it may be postponed or continued, hear the evidence offered by parties interested for or against the proposed alterations or new road, and must ascertain and by order declare the amount of damage awarded to each non-consenting land-owner over whose land they shall order the road to be opened, whether known or unknown, and declare the report of the viewers to be approved or rejected, in whole or in part." I think it clearly appears that by virtue of this provision of the Code the board acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine all questions relating to the report of the viewers, and to approve or reject that report either wholly or in part. That report was regular and valid upon its face, and the only question raised in regard to it was whether or not it was true,—a question of fact to be resolved according to the weight of evidence. If, as contended, the conclusion or finding of the board upon this issue was contrary to the evidence, it was merely an error committed in the exercise of unquestionable jurisdiction, and is therefore beyond the reach of a writ of review. Central P. R. Co. v. Placer Co., 34 Cal 361, 46 Cal. 670; Buckley v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. 119, 31 Pac. 8; Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Board of Equalization, 97 Cal. 327, 32 Pac. 312. But, even if such an error could have been corrected upon a writ of review, all the evidence applicable to the issue must have been brought before the court of review, in some officially authenticated form, as part of the record of the board. In this case it does not appear that any part of the testimony of the 10 witnesses that appear to have testified before the board was reduced to writing; and though the clerk of the board, W. H. Sale, whose affidavit was rejected, certified that his official return to the writ of review was "a full, true, and correct copy of the original proceedings of the board of supervisors of Glenn county, * * * as the same remain of record and on file in my office," yet no part of the testimony of witnesses is contained in that return; and the court was not asked to order any amended or additional return, but only to make Sale's unofficial affidavit as to what one of the 10 witnesses testified a part of the record which he had officially certified to be full, true, and correct. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment. Upon the face of the return to the writ the proceedings of the board of supervisors were regular, and nothing to the contrary is suggested by the appellant. The only point urged by her as error is the refusal of the court to allow the return to be amended by an ex parte affidavit that there was testimony before the board of supervisors to the effect that one of the signers of the report did not view or lay out the road. The affidavit did not purport to state that the viewer did not act, but that some persons had stated that he did not act. It needs no argument to show that a return cannot be amended in this manner. Whether the board of supervisors acquired jurisdiction of the proceedings is a question which is not presented by the record before us, and upon which no opinion should be expressed. I am not prepared to hold that the mere fact of giving the notice required by the statute vests the board of supervisors with such jurisdiction over the proceedings as to preclude the right to show that the purported report, upon which their right to give such notice rests, was false. This is entirely different from attempting to show that after the jurisdiction had been acquired they decided erroneously upon the evidence before them (Central P. R. Co. v. Placer Co., 34 Cal. 361), or that evidence was improperly received by them (Id., 46 Cal. 670).

CHAPMAN et al. v. HUGHES. (No. 18,246.)[1]

PARTNERSHIP—WHAT CONSTITUTES—DISSOLUTION—FIRM PROPERTY.

1. Where persons entering into a joint business enterprise contract to do all that in law is necessary to constitute a partnership, they are a partnership inter se, though they did not expressly intend to create such relationship.

2. Under Civ. Code, §§ 2401–2403, providing that property contributed by the partners shall be partnership property, the fact that they agree to retain the "title" in themselves separately is immaterial.

3. Where three persons enter into a partnership for the sale of land, the assignment by two of the partners of their interest in the partnership property to the third, and the entering into of another agreement for the division of the proceeds, is a dissolution of the partnership.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by W. S. Chapman and another against Thomas E. Hughes. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Maxwell, Dorsey & Soto, for appellants. L. L. Cory, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action for an accounting with reference to certain real-estate transactions in which plaintiffs claim to be interested with defendant as partners, and in which it is alleged large profits were made, and appropriated by defendant, who refused to account. Findings were in favor of defendant upon all the issues, upon which judgment was entered in his favor, and plaintiffs appeal upon a bill of exceptions. The pleadings and findings are voluminous, but, from the view we take of the questions involved, no extended statement of the facts is required.

1. On the question whether the 5,120-acre tract was bought by Hughes for himself, or for joint account of himself and the plaintiffs as copartners, and held in trust for the partnership, the court finds "that the defendant and plaintiffs were not at any time the owners or seised in fee of any of the pieces, parcels, or tracts of land described in paragraph 3 of the amended complaint, or any portion thereof, as copartners; that no portion of any of said land stood at any time in the name of Thomas E. Hughes for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs, and no portion of said property at any time stood in the name of the defendant, Thomas E. Hughes, in trust or otherwise for the parties to this action as copartners, or in any other way,—the fact being that Thomas E. Hughes was the owner and entitled to the sole and absolute possession of the whole thereof in fee simple." A careful examination satisfies us that the evidence upon this question, while possibly preponderating to some extent in favor of plaintiffs, is substantially conflicting, and the finding cannot, therefore, be disturbed. This finding being sustained, the entire claim of plaintiffs based upon the contention that there existed between the parties a partnership in this particular tract, independently of the syndicate agreement, must fall to the ground.

2. The syndicate agreement did, in our judgment, constitute a partnership, within the definition of section 2,395 of the Civil Code. It created an association of three persons for the purpose of carrying on together the business of selling the lands, and dividing the profits of that business between them. It contemplated united action in advertising and otherwise in promoting sales, and a joint expense to be incurred thereby, and further expressly provided for the payment to the syndicate of commissions on sales of other lands than those put into the syndicate. This was sufficient to constitute the relation that of partnership. Whether the parties knew that they were partners or not, they certainly intended and contracted to do all that in law is necessary to create a partnership. The relation of partnership may be established although the parties may not expressly intend to create such relationship. Pars. Partn. p. 86; Duryea v. Whitcomb, 31 Vt. 395. The respective parcels of land embraced in the syndicate were contributed by the respective partners, and thereby became partnership property. Civ. Code, §§ 2401–2403. This was not affected by the agreement that each partner should retain his title; they held the legal title in trust for the partnership use.

But the court finds that the relationship of the parties under the syndicate agreement was in effect dissolved, and their rights thereunder determined, by the subsequent agreement entered into between the defendant and each of the plaintiffs, separately, in 1883; and this, we think, was their substantial effect.

[1] For dissenting opinion, see 38 Pac. —.

The mere assignment by one partner to another partner of his interest in the partnership property does not, it is true, dissolve the partnership (Civ. Code, § 2450); and the two agreements of 1888, so far as they operated merely to convey the land, did not, therefore, dissolve the partnership. But as these two agreements operated to vest in defendant the whole beneficial ownership of the land contributed by the plaintiffs to said partnership. and provided for the distribution of the proceeds in a manner different from, and inconsistent with, that provided by the syndicate agreement, the defendant became thereby the owner of the whole capital originally contributed by the plaintiffs, and those agreements must, therefore, be deemed a dissolution of the partnership so far as the plaintiffs are concerned. Plaintiffs are therefore not entitled to any profits made after that time, so far as the syndicate agreement is concerned, and, as the court finds that no profits were made prior to that time, they must be remitted to their rights under their separate agreements, under which it was found all the sales were made. Those rights are not involved in this action, and cannot, therefore, be determined herein. The judgment is affirmed.

BARNETT v. BARNETT et al. (No. 18,303.)

CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—LIFE ESTATE—HEIRS OF THE BODY—HABENDUM CLAUSE—EFFECT.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 779, providing that "when a remainder is limited to the heirs or heir of the body of a person to whom a life estate in the same property is given, the persons who on the termination of the life estate are the successors or heirs of the body of the owner for life are entitled to it by virtue of the remainder so limited, and not as mere successors of the owner for life," a deed, in printed form, purporting to "give, grant, alien, and confirm to the party of the second part, and to his heirs (and assigns, forever)" certain lands, to have and to hold "unto the party of the second part (his heirs and assigns, forever) for and during his natural life, and to the issue and heirs of the body of the said party of the second part," in which the words in parentheses were erased, and all following the last parenthesis was added in writing, conveys a life estate only to the grantee.

2. Where from the whole deed it appears that the grantor intended by the habendum clause to restrain, limit, or enlarge the estate named in the granting clause, the habendum prevails over the granting clause.

3. The use of the word "heirs" in a granting clause is not repugnant to a habendum clause creating a life estate, since by Civ. Code, § 1072, the same estate would pass whether the word was inserted or omitted.

4. Civ. Code, § 763, providing that "every estate which at common law would be adjudged to be a fee tail is a fee simple," does not apply to an instrument conveying only a life estate, though at common law it would convey a fee tail.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by F. Joseph Barnett against Lena Barnett and others to establish a fee-simple estate under a certain conveyance, and to restrain defendants from claiming any interest therein. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stanton & Carter and E. D. Edwards, for appellant. J. W. Knox and S. S. Wright, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. March 14, 1890, B. B. Barnett executed to the plaintiff herein a deed of conveyance of certain lands in Fresno county, by which he purported to "give, grant, alien, and confirm unto the said party of the second part, and to his heirs (and assigns, forever), all those certain lots, pieces, or parcels of land, * * * to have and to hold, all and singular, the said premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part (heirs and assigns, forever), for and during his natural life, and to the issue and heirs of the body of the said party of the second part." The instrument was upon a printed form, and the above words in parentheses were erased therefrom, and the words in italics were inserted in writing. The defendant Lena Barnett is the daughter and sole issue of the plaintiff, and the other defendants are his brothers and sisters. The plaintiff claims that, by the aforesaid instrument, the lands therein described were conveyed to him in fee; and as the defendants claim that he took thereby only a life estate, and that at his death the heirs of his body will take the fee, he brought this action to procure a judgment in accordance with his said claim, and to restrain the defendants from making any claim thereto. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the court below, upon the ground that it failed to state a cause of action, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

At the common law, by what is commonly called the "Rule in Shelley's Case," the above instrument would undoubtedly be construed as giving to the plaintiff the fee in the lands, and, if it had been executed prior to the adoption of the Civil Code, would have received the same construction in this state. Norris v. Hensley, 27 Cal. 439; Estate of Utz, 43 Cal. 200. Section 779 of the Civil Code, however, provides: "When a remainder is limited to the heirs or heirs of the body of a person to whom a life estate in the same property is given, the persons who on the termination of the life estate are the successors or heirs of the body of the owner for life are entitled to it by virtue of the remainder so limited to them, and not as mere successors of the owner for life." The effect of this section is to abrogate the rule in Shelley's Case, and, with other sections in the Civil Code, to furnish the rules by which to determine the estate or interest in the lands which the plaintiff took by virtue of the grant. Civ. Code, § 4. Section 1105 declares that "a fee simple title is presumed to be intended to pass by a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended;" and, if it does appear from the grant that a lesser estate was intended, no such presumption exists. A grant is to be interpreted in the same manner as any other contract (section 1066), so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, if that intention can be ascertained (section 1636); and, for the purpose of ascertaining that intention, "the whole of the contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other" (section 1641). The intention, it is sometimes said, is to be gathered from the four corners of the instrument, and, in case of a grant, the habendum, as well as any other portion of the instrument, is to be considered. The ordinary use of the habendum is to define or limit the quantity of interest, or the estate which the grantee is to have in the property granted, and, although usually made a separate portion of the instrument, is not necessarily so, but may be wholly omitted, and the interest or estate granted may be defined or limited in the premises or granting part of the conveyance. Montgomery v. Sturdivant, 41 Cal. 290. The rule that, if the habendum is repugnant to the premises, it is to be disregarded, is only another form of the rule that, "if several parts of a grant are absolutely irreconcilable, the former part prevails." Civ. Code, § 1070. The intention of the parties to the grant is to be gathered from the instrument itself, and determined by a proper construction of the language used therein; but, for the purpose of ascertaining this intention, the entire instrument, the habendum as well as the premises, are to be considered; and, if it appear from such consideration that the grantor intended by the habendum clause to restrict or limit or enlarge the estate named in the granting clause, the habendum will prevail over the granting clause. Faivre v. Daley, 93 Cal. 670, 29 Pac. 256; Pelissier v. Corker (Cal.) 37 Pac. 465. "It is in such case to be considered as an addendum or proviso to the conveyancing clause, which, by a well-settled rule of construction, must control the conveyancing clause or premises, even to the extent of destroying the effect of the same." Bodine v. Arthur, 91 Ky. 53, 14 S. W. 904.

Taking into consideration the whole of the instrument under discussion, it is clear that it was the intention of the grantor that the habendum should operate as a proviso or limitation to the granting clause, and control it to the extent of limiting the estate conveyed to the plaintiff to a life estate, with a remainder to the issue and heirs of his body. The use of the word "heirs" in the granting clause creates no repugnance between that clause and the habendum, since the same estate would pass to the plaintiff whether this word were inserted or omitted (Civ. Code, § 1072); and the subsequent limitation in the habendum shows that the grantor did not intend by its use to create an estate in fee in the plaintiff. Henderson v. Mack, 82 Ky. 379. No present estate would pass to the "heirs" (Hall v. Leonard, 1 Pick. 27); and at common law the use of this word would have had the effect merely to create a fee, instead of a life estate. By section 779, Civ. Code, the term "heirs" is changed from a word of limitation to one of purchase, and becomes a specific designation of a class which will have the right to the property upon the termination of the life estate. Upon that event they take the property, not by descent or as successors of the plaintiff, but by virtue of the remainder which was created for them at the execution of the deed to him. This remainder, although not capable of immediate enjoyment (Id. § 690), and therefore denominated a "future interest," is, nevertheless, an estate in the property capable of being transferred in the same manner as a present interest (Id. § 699).

Counsel for appellant states in his brief that the only question on this appeal is "whether the deed in question conveyed an estate in fee simple to plaintiff, or a life estate to plaintiff, with remainder in fee to the issue and heirs of his body;" and we therefore limit our decision to this proposition, and hold that by the instrument in question a life-estate only was conveyed to the plaintiff. Section 763 of the Civil Code has no application. This section provides that "every estate which would be at common law adjudged to be a fee tail is a fee simple." It does not provide that every instrument which at common law would be construed to create an estate tail shall be construed to create a fee simple, but that the "estate" which would be adjudged a fee tail is a fee simple. The rule of construction is defined in section 4 of the Civil Code; and we have seen that, upon a proper construction of the instrument in question, only a life estate was conveyed to the plaintiff. Being a life estate only, it is not an estate of inheritance, and hence cannot be an estate tail. As was said in Bodine v. Arthur, 91 Ky. 56, 14 S. W. 904, with reference to a similar statute: "To construe the statute as raising this life estate to the dignity of a fee-simple estate would be absurd, and would wholly defeat the object of the grantor." The judgment is affirmed.

PORPHYRY PAVING CO. v. ANCKER.

(No. 19,423.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS—POSTING OF NOTICE.

Act March 18, 1885, as amended March 31, 1891, referring to work upon streets, provides that a resolution of intention by the city council shall be posted and published for a period of two days, and that "thereupon" the street superintendent shall post a more particular notice along the line of the contemplated improvement. Held, that "thereupon" is not used in the sense of "immediately thereafter," and it is sufficient if the latter notice be posted within a reasonable time.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by the Porphyry Paving Company against L. Ancker to enforce a street assessment. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles R. Gray, for appellant. C. T. H. Palmer and F. W. Gregg, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce a street assessment against defendant's land situate in the city of San Bernardino. The judgment of the lower court was in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial.

1. Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the complaint on the grounds that it does not state a cause of action, and that it is ambiguous and contradictory. The complaint appears to be neither ambiguous nor contradictory, and I think it states a cause of action. But it is contended by counsel for appellant that it is deficient in several respects, only one of which, however, is sufficiently plausible to merit special consideration. The third section of the act of March 18, 1885, "To provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys," etc., as amended March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 196), provides: "Before ordering any work to be done * * * the city council shall pass a resolution of intention so to do, and describing the work, which shall be posted conspicuously for two days on or near the chamber door of said council, and published by two insertions in one or more daily, semiweekly or weekly newspapers published and circulated in said city, and designated by said council for that purpose. The street superintendent shall thereupon cause to be conspicuously posted along the line of said contemplated work or improvement * * * notices of the passage of said resolution. * * * He shall also cause a notice, similar in substance, to be published for six days," in designated newspapers. It is properly alleged in the complaint that the resolution of intention was posted and published for two days in the manner required, "said posting being continuous from January 6, 1892, to January 16, 1892, * * * said publication being on the sixth, seventh, and eighth days of January, 1892; * * * and that upon the 26th day of March, 1892, the street superintendent of said city caused to be posted, along the line of said contemplated work," the notice required to be posted by him, and caused a similar notice to be published in a newspaper, etc. The point made by appellant is that it should have been alleged that the street superintendent posted and published the notice required to be posted by him immediately after the expiration of the two-days publication of the notice posted on the chamber door of the council, whereas it is alleged that the notices required to be posted and published by him were posted and published March 26, 1892,—more than two months after the two-days publication. It is contended that the word "thereupon," in the sentence, "The street superintendent shall thereupon cause to be conspicuously posted," etc., means "immediately;" that is, immediately after the two-days publication. The Century Dictionary defines the word as follows: "(1) Upon that. (2) In consequence of that; by reason of that. (3) Immediately after that; without delay; in sequence, but not necessarily in consequence." Webster's definitions are: "(1) Upon that or this. (2) On account of that; in consequence of that. (3) Immediately; at once; without delay." No doubt the word is much oftener used in the sense of the first and second of these definitions than in that of the third, as indicated by the order in which they are given; but which of these senses was intended by its use in any particular case is to be determined almost entirely by reference to its context. It is sometimes used to express the succession of events in the order of time, regardless of the length of the period intervening; and it has been held to refer to the consideration upon which a promise was made. In Bean v. Ayers, 67 Me. 487, the question was whether the declaration alleged a consideration for a promise. The allegation was that plaintiff delivered certain spruce and hemlock logs to defendants at their request, and that "thereupon" the defendants delivered their agreement to the plaintiff, etc. The defendants contended that the word "thereupon" was used merely to mark the succession of facts in the order of time; but the court said: "The word 'thereupon' undoubtedly has different meanings. We think, however, it may fairly be considered as referring to the reason of the promise of the defendants."

The third section of the street law under consideration requires a resolution of intention and notice thereof to be posted and published for a period of two days as necessary conditions precedent to the publication and posting of a more particular notice by the superintendent of streets for a period of six days, since the latter publication would be of no avail without prior publication of the former. As used in that section, under these circumstances, the word "thereupon" refers to the conditions precedent, and means that the publication by the street superintendent is to be made upon those precedent conditions, and necessarily implies that the publication by the superintendent of streets must follow the resolution of intention and the publication thereof, in order of time. But there is nothing in the context or in the subject-matter indicating that the six-days publication by the superintendent must immediately follow the two-days publication. That it should follow within a reasonable time is the most that should be claimed. It will hardly be contended that a delay of five, or even ten, days would vitiate all prior proceedings, and necessitate a commencement thereof de novo. What would be an unreasonable delay in one case might be reasonable in another, under different circumstances. To sustain a general demurrer to the complaint on the ground of such delay (if it could be done in any case), the unreasonableness of the delay must conclusively appear on the face of the complaint; for, if the delay is mere matter of defense, the reasonableness of which is to be determined by evidence at the trial, it is not a ground of demurrer at all. Does it conclusively appear from the complaint alone that two and a half months' delay of the publication of notices by the superintendent was unreasonable? I think not. The two-days publication of the notice of intention to do the work expired early in January, which is ordinarily followed by two or three of the most inclement months of the year. Who can say, from aught that appears in the complaint, that it was not reasonable, or not even advisable, to postpone the commencement of grading the street until April. See Hart v. Plum, 14 Cal. 155.

2. On the appeal from the order denying a new trial, appellant contends that the evidence does not justify the findings by the court. I have carefully examined all the points under this head presented by appellant's counsel, with the result that, in my opinion, the evidence clearly justifies the findings excepted to. I therefore think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.
